is the Buddha-nature itself;The empty delusory body is the very body of the Dharma.When t awakens completely,There is nothing at all.The source of our self-natureIs the Buddha of in truth.Mental and physical reactions come and goLike clouds in the empty sky;Greed, hatred appear and disappearLike bubbles on the surface of the sea.When we realize actuality,Ther distinction between mind and thingAnd the path to hell instantly vanishes.If this is a lie to foo world,My tongue may be cut out forever.Once we awaken to the Tathagata-Zen,The six nob thousand good actionsAre already complete within us.In our dream we see the six levels of clearly;After we awaken the whole universe is empty.No bad fortune, no good fortune, no lo gain;Never seek such things in eternal serenity.For years the dusty mirror has gone unclean polish it completely, once and for all.Who has no-thought? Who is not-born?If we are truly n not un-born either.Ask a robot if this is not so.How can we realize ourselvesBy virtuous dee seeking the Buddha?Release your hold on earth, water, fire, wind;Drink and eat as you wish serenity.All things are transient and completely empty;This is the great enlightenment of the Tathagata.Transience, emptiness and enlightenment --These are the ultimate truths of Budd teaching them is true Sangha devotion.If you don`t agree, please ask me about it.Cut out dir of it all, --This is the very point of the Buddha-seal.I can't respond to any concern about leav branches.People do not recognize the Mani-jewel.Living intimately within the Tathagata-garl our sight, hearing, smell, taste, sensation, awareness;And all of these are empty, yet not em shining from this perfect Mani-jewelHave the form of no form at all.Clarify the five eyes and five powers;This is not intellectual work, -- just realize, just know.It is not difficult to see imag enlightened one walks the free way of NirvanaWith melody that is old and clear in spiritAnd elegant in style,But with body that is tough and bony,Passing unnoticed in the world.We kno sons and daughtersAre poor in body, but not in the Tao.In their poverty, they always wear ra clothing,But they have the jewel of no price treasured within.This jewel of no price can never upThough they spend it freely to help people they meet.Dharmakaya, Sambogakaya, Nirma kinds of wisdomAre all contained within.The eight kinds of emancipation and the six universa impressed on the ground of their mind.The best student goes directly to the ultimate,The oth learned but their faith is uncertain.Remove the dirty garments from your own mind;Why shou your outward striving?Some may slander, some may abuse;They try to set fire to the heaver end by merely tiring themselves out.I hear their scandal as though it were ambrosial truth;Im everything meltsAnd I enter the place beyond thought and words.When I consider the virtue words,I find the scandal-monger is my good teacher.If we do not become angry at gossip,W powerful endurance and compassion.To be mature in Zen is to be mature in expression,And of dhyana and prajnaDoes not stagnate in emptiness.Not only can I take hold of complete e incomparable lion-roar of doctrineShatters the brains of the one hundred kinds of animals.Ev elephants will run away, forgetting his pride;Only the heavenly dragon listens calmly, with pu wandered over rivers and seas, crossing mountains and streams,Visiting teachers, asking a personal interviews;Since I recognized the Sixth Founding Teacher at Ts'ao Ch'i,I know wha relativity of birth and death.Walking is Zen, sitting is Zen;Speaking or silent, active or quiet, t essence is at peace.Even facing the sword of death, our mind is unmoved;Even drinking poi quiet.Our teacher, Shakyamuni, met Dipankara BuddhaAnd for many eons he trained as Ks ascetic.Many births, many deaths;I am serene in this cycle,--there is no end to it.Since I abru realized the unborn,I have had no reason for joy or sorrowAt any honor or disgrace.I have e mountains to silence and beauty;In a profound valley beneath high cliffs,I sit under the old p trees.Zazen in my rustic cottageIs peaceful, lonely, and truly comfortable.When you truly aw no formal merit.In the multiplicity of the relative world,You cannot find such freedom.Self-cer brings the joy of heaven itself,But it is like shooting an arrow at the sky;When the force is ex falls to the earth,And then everything goes wrong.Why should this be betterThan the true wa absolute,Directly penetrating the ground of Tathagata?Just take hold of the sourceAnd neve branches.It is like a treasure-moonEnclosed in a beautiful emerald.Now I understand this Ma gain is the gain of everyone endlessly.The moon shines on the river,The wind blows through pines,--Whose providence is this long beautiful evening?The Buddha-nature jewel of moralit the ground of my mind,And my robe is the dew, the fog, the cloud, and the mist.A bowl once dragonsAnd a staff separated fighting tigers;The rings on this staff jingle musically.The form expressions is not to be taken lightly;The treasure-staff of the TathagataHas left traces for u follow.The awakened one does not seek truth--Does not cut off delusion.Truth and delusion and without form,But this no-form is neither empty nor not empty;It is the truly real form of th Tathagata.The mind-mirror is clear, so there are no obstacles.Its brilliance illuminates the un the depths and in every grain of sand.Multitudinous things of the cosmosAre all reflected in t this full clarity is beyond inner and outer.To live in nothingness is to ignore cause and effect; leads only to disaster.The one who clings to vacancy, rejecting the world of things,Escapes but leaps into fire.Holding truth and rejecting delusion--These are but skillful lies.Students wh zazen by such liesLove thievery in their own children.They miss the Dharma-treasure;They power;And this disaster follows directly upon dualistic thinking.So Zen is the complete realiz mind,The complete cutting off of delusion,The power of wise vision penetrating directly to the unborn.Students of vigorous will hold the sword of wisdom;The prajna edge is a diamond fla cuts off useless knowledge,But also exterminates delusions.They roar with Dharma-thunder emancipated.High in the Himalayas, only fei-ni grass grows.Here cows produce pure and de this food I continually enjoy.One complete nature passes to all natures;One universal Dharm Dharmas.One moon is reflected in many waters;All the water-moons are from the one moon all Buddhas has entered my own nature, And my nature becomes one with the Tathagata.O contains all levels;It is not matter, mind nor activity.In an instant eighty-thousand teachings a fulfilled;In a twinkling the evil of eons is destroyed.All categories are no category;What relati have these to my insight?Beyond praise, beyond blame, --Like space itself it has no bounds is eternally full and serene,If you search elsewhere, you cannot see it.You cannot grasp it, y reject it;In the midst of not gaining,In that condition you gain it.It speaks in silence,In speech hear its silence.The great way has opened and there are no obstacles.If someone asks, wha how do you understand it?I reply, the power of tremendous prajna.People say it is positive;P is negative;But they do not know.A smooth road, a rough road --Even heaven cannot imagin my zazen for many eons;I do not say this to confuse you.I raise the Dharma-banner and set teaching;It is the clear doctrine of the BuddhaWhich I found with my teacher, Hui Neng,Maha the Buddha-successor,Received the lamp and passed it on.Twenty-eight generations of tea over seas and rivers to our landBodhi Dharma came as our own first founder,And his robe, a passed through six teachers here,And how many generations to come may gain the path,No is not set forth;The false is basically vacant.Put both existence and non-existence aside,The non-vacancy is vacant,The twenty kinds of vacancy have no basis,And the oneness of the T naturally sameness.Mind is the base, phenomena are dust;Yet both are like a flaw in the mir flaw is brushed aside,The light begins to shine.When both mind and phenomena are forgotte naturally genuine.Ah, the degenerate materialistic world!People are unhappy; they find self-c difficult.In the centuries since Shakyamuni, false views are deep,Demons are strong, the Dh disturbances are many.People hear the Buddha's doctrine of immediacy,And if they accept i be crushedAs easily as a roofing tile.But they cannot accept, what a pity!Your mind is the so action;Your body is the agent of calamity;No pity nor blame to anyone else.If you don't seek to hell,Never slander the Tathagata's true teaching.In the sandalwood forest, there is no oth the lion lives in such deep luxuriant woods,Wandering freely in a state of peace.Other anima stay far away.Just baby lions follow the parent,And three-year-olds already roar loudly.How directnessIs not a matter for human emotion.If you doubt this or feel uncertain,Then you mu with me.This is not the free rein of a mountain monk's ego.I fear your training may lead to wr permanent soul or complete extinction.Being is not being; non-being is not non-being;Miss th hair,And you are off by a thousand miles.Understanding it, the dragon-child abruptly attains Buddhahood;Misunderstanding it, the greatest scholar falls into hell.From my youth I piled st studies,In sutras and sastras I searched and researched,Classifying terms and forms, oblivio entered the sea to count the sands in vainAnd then the Tathagata scolded me kindlyAs I rea counting your neighbor's treasure?"My work had been scattered and entirely useless,For ye blown by the wind.If the seed-nature is wrong, misunderstandings arise,And the Buddha's d immediacy cannot be attained.Shravaka and Pratyeka students may study earnestlyBut they aspiration.Others may be very clever,But they lack prajna.Stupid ones, childish ones,They s is something in an empty fist.They mistake the pointing finger for the moon.They are idle dre form and sensation.Not supposing something is the Tathagata.This is truly called Kwan-Yin, who sees freely.When awakened we find karmic hindrances fundamentally empty.But when repay all our debts.The hungry are served a king's repast,And they cannot eat.The sick mee doctors;Why don't they recover?The practice of Zen in this greedy world --This is the power vision.The lotus lives in the midst of the fire;It is never destroyed.Pradhanashura broke the g precepts;But he went on to realize the unborn.The Buddhahood he attained in that momentL our time.The incomparable lion roar of the doctrine!How sad that people are stubbornly igno knowing that crime blocks enlightenment,Not seeing the secret of the Tathagata teaching.Tw guilty of murder and carnality.Their leader, Upali, had the light of a glow-worm;He just added guilt.Vimalakirti cleared their doubts at onceAs sunshine melts the frost and snow.The rema emancipationWorks wonders innumerable as the sands of the Ganges.To this we offer cloth

Loving Kindness

He who is skilled in his good and who wishes to attain that state of Calm should act (thus:) He should be able, upright, perfectly upright, obedient, gentle, and humble.

Contented, easily supportable, with few duties, of light livelihood, controlled in senses, discreet, not imprudent, not be greedily attached to families.

He should not commit any slight wrong such that other wise men might censure him.

May all beings be happy and secure.

May their minds be wholesome.

Whatever living beings there be: feeble or strong, long, stout, or medium, short, small, or large, seen or unseen, those dwelling far or near, those who are born and those who are to be born --may all beings, without exception, be happy-minded!

Let not one deceive another nor despise any person whatever in any place. In anger or ill will, let him not wish any harm to another.

Just as a mother would protect her only child even at the risk of her own life, even so let him cultivate a boundless heart towards all beings.

Let his thoughts of boundless love pervade the whole world: above, below and across--without any obstruction, without any hatred, without any enmity, Whether he stands, walks, sits or lies down, as long as he is awake, he should develop mindfulness. This, they say, is the Highest Conduct.

Not falling into error, virtuous and endowed with insight, he gives up attachment to sense-desires. He will surely not be born in any womb again

Discourse on Blessings

Thus have I heard:

On one occasion the Exalted One was dwelling at the monastery of Anathapindika, in Jeta's Grove, near Savatthi. Now when the night was far spent, a certain deity, whose surpassing splendour illuminated the entire Jeta Grove, came to the presence of the Exalted One, and, drawing near, respectfully saluted Him and stood at one side. Standing thus, he addressed the Exalted One in verse:

Many deities and men, yearning after good, have pondered on Blessings. Pray, tell me the Highest Blessing!

Not to associate with fools, to associate with the wise, and to honour those who are worthy of honour - this is the Highest Blessing.

To reside in a suitable locality, to have done meritorious actions in the past, and to set oneself in the right course - this is the Highest Blessing.

Vast-learning, perfect handicraft, a highly trained discipline, and pleasant speech - this is the Highest Blessing.

The support of father and mother, the cherishing of wife and children, and peaceful occupations - this is the Highest Blessing.

Liberality, righteous conduct, the helping of relatives, and blameless actions - this is the Hig Blessing.

To cease and abstain from evil, forbearance with respect to intoxicants, and steadfastness in virtue - this is the Highest Blessing.

Reverence, humility, contentment, gratitude and the opportune hearing of the Dhamma - this is the Highest Blessing.

Patience, obedience, sight of the Samanas (Sanctified Ones), and religious discussions at due seasons - this is the Highest Blessing.

Self Control, Holy Life, perception of the Noble Truths, and the realisation of Nibbana - this is the Highest Blessing.

He whose mind does not flutter by contact with worldly contingencies, Sorrowless, Stainless, and Secure - this is the Highest Blessing.

To them, fulfilling matters such as these, every-where invincible, in every way moving happily - these are the Highest Blessings.

RATANA SUTTA-THE JEWEL DISCOURSE

This Discourse was delivered by the Buddha in the city of Vesali whose citizens appealed to the Buddha for help, being afflicted by famine, pestilenee and disturbances from evil spirits. As a mark of protection for the people of Vesali, the Buddha delivered this discourse after which the evil spirits were exorcised and the pestilence subsided.

Whatever beings are here assembled, whether terrestrial or celestial, may they all be happy!

Moreover may they attentively listen to my words!

Accordingly give good heed, all ye beings! Show your love to the human beings who, day and night, bring offerings to you. Wherefore guard them zealously.

Whatever treasure there be either here or in the world beyond, or whatever precious jewel in the precious jewel. By this truth may there be happiness!

The tranquil Sage of the Sakyas realised that Cessation, Passion-free, Immortality Supreme.

There is nought comparable with the Dhamma. Verily, in the Dhamma is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

That Sanctity praised by the Buddha Supreme is described as "concentration without interruption. There is nought like that Concentration. Verily, in the Dhamma is this precious jewel. By this truth may there be happiness!

Those Eight Individuals, praised by the virtuous, constitute four pairs. They, the worthy of offerings, the disciples of the Welcome One, - to these gifts given yield abundant fruit.

Verily, in the Sangha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

With steadfast mind, applying themselves thoroughly in the Dispensation of Gotama, exempt (from passion), they have attained to "that which should be attained", and, plunging into the Deathless, they enjoy Peace obtained without price.

Verily, in the Sangha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

Just as a firm post, sunk in the earth, cannot be shaken by the four winds; even so do I declare him to be a righteous person who thoroughly perceives the Noble Truths.

Verily, in the Sangha is the precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

Those who comprehend clearly the Noble Truths, well taught by Him of wisdom deep, do not, however exceeding heedless they may be, undergo an eighth birth.

Verily, in the Sangha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

For him with the acquisition of Insight, three conditions come to nought - namely, self-illusion, doubt, and indulgence in (wrongful) rites and ceremonies, should there be any. From the four states of misery, he is absolutely freed, and is incapable of committing the six heinous crimes.

Verily, in the Sangha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

Whatever evil deed he does, whether by deed, word or thought, he is incapable of hiding it; for it hath been said that such an act is impossible for one who has seen the Path.

Verily, in the Sangha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

Like unto the woodland groves with blossomed tree tops in the first heat of the summer season, hath the sublime doctrine, that leads to Nibbana, been taught for the Highest Good.

Verily, in the Buddha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness.

The unrivalled Excellent One, the Knower, the Giver, and the Bringer of the Excellent has expounded the excellent Doctrine.

Verily, in the Buddha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

Their past is extinct, a fresh becoming there is not, their minds are not attached to a future birth, their desires grow not - those wise ones go out even as this lamp.

Verily, in the Sangha is this precious jewel.

By this truth may there be happiness!

We beings here assembled, whether terrestrial or celestial, salute the Accomplished Buddha, honoured by gods and men. May there be happiness!

We beings here assembled, whether terrestrial or celestial, salute the Accomplished Dhamma, honoured by gods and men. May there be happiness!

We beings here assembled, whether terrestrial or celestial, salute the Accomplished Sangha, honoured by gods and men. May there be happiness!

True Refuge

People have gone to many kinds of refuge, to mountain peaks, forests, parks, trees, and shrines:
those who are threatened with fear or danger.

These are not the safe refuge, these are not the highest refuge, in fact they are not the refuge!
having gone to these,
you gain release not,
from all suffering and miseries.

When One has gone for refuge, to the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha,
you can see with right understanding,
The four Noble Truths :-
Suffering,
The Cause of suffering,
The Cessation of suffering, and The Noble Eightfold Path,
(the Path leading to the extinction of suffering).

This is the safe refuge,
this is the highest refuge, in fact this is the only refuge!
having gone to the Three Jewels,
you gain release,
from all suffering and miseries.

INTRODUCTION

by Bhikkhu Bodhi

The practice of giving is universally recognized as one of the most basic human virtues, a quality that testifies to the depth of one's humanity and one's capacity for self-transcendence. In the teaching of the Buddha, too, the practice of giving claims a place of special eminence, one which singles it out as being in a sense the foundation and seed of spiritual development. In the Pali suttas we read time and again that "talk on giving" (//danakatha//) was invariably the first topic to be discussed by the Buddha in his "graduated exposition" of the Dhamma. Whenever the Buddha delivered a discourse to an audience of people who had not yet come to regard him as their teacher, he would start by emphasizing the value of giving. Only after his audience had come to appreciate this virtue would he introduce other aspects of his teaching, such as morality, the law of kamma, and the benefits in renunciation, and only after all these principles had made their impact on the minds of his listeners would he expound to them that unique discovery of the Awakened Ones, the Four Noble Truths.

Strictly speaking, giving does not appear in its own right among the factors of the Noble Eightfold Path, nor does it enter among the other requisites of enlightenment (//bodhipakkhiya dhamma//). Most probably it has been excluded from these groupings because the practice of giving does not by its own nature conduce directly and immediately to the arising of insight and the realization of the Four Noble Truths. Giving functions in the Buddhist discipline in a different capacity. It does not come at the apex of the path, as a factor constituent of the process of awakening, but rather it serves as a basis and preparation which underlies and quietly supports the entire endeavour to free the mind from the defilements.

Nevertheless, though giving is not counted directly among the factors of the path, its contribution to progress along the road to liberation should not be overlooked or underestimated. The prominence of this contribution is underscored by the place which the Buddha assigns to giving in various sets of practices he has laid down for his followers. Besides appearing as the first topic in the graduated exposition of the Dhamma, the practice of giving also figures as the first of the three bases of meritorious deeds (//punnakiriyavatthu//), as the first of the four means of benefiting others (//sangahavatthu//), and as the first of the ten //paramis// or "perfections." The latter are the sublime virtues to be cultivated by all aspirants to enlightenment, and to the most exalted degree by those who follow the way of the Bodhisatta aimed at the supreme enlightenment of perfect Buddhahood.

Regarded from another angle, giving can also be identified with the personal quality of generosity (//caga//). This angle highlights the practice of giving, not as the outwardly manifest act by which an object is transferred from oneself to others, but as the inward disposition to give, a disposition which is strengthened by outward acts of giving and which in turn makes possible still more demanding acts of self-sacrifice. Generosity is included among the essential attributes of the //sappurisa//, the good or superior person, along with such other qualities as faith, morality, learning and wisdom. Viewed as the quality of generosity, giving has a particularly intimate connection to the entire movement of the Buddha's path. For the goal of the path is the destruction of greed, hate and delusion, and the cultivation of generosity directly debilitates greed and hate, while facilitating that pliancy of mind that allows for the eradication of delusion.

The present //Wheel// publication has been compiled in order to explore in greater depth this cardinal Buddhist virtue, the practice of giving, which in writings on applied Buddhism is so often taken for granted that it is usually passed over without comment. In this issue four practicing Buddhists of today, all of whom combine textual knowledge of the Buddha's teachings with a personal commitment to the path, set forth their understanding of the various aspects of giving and examine it in relation to the wider body of Dhamma practice.

The collection concludes with a translation of an older document -- the description of the Bodhisatta's practice of giving by the medieval commentator, Acariya Dhammapala. This has been extracted from his Treatise on the Paramis, found in his commentary to the Cariyapitaka.

THE PRACTICE OF GIVING

Susan Elbaum Jootla

The inspiration and basic material for this essay come from //The Perfection of Generosity (Dana Parami)//, by Saya U Chit Tin, published as No. 3 in the Dhamma Series of the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, U.K., Splatts House, Heddington near Calne, Wiltshire, England. I am deeply grateful to Saya U Chit Tin and to all the other teachers associated with the International Meditation Centres at Heddington, U.K. and Rangoon, Burma.

Giving (//dana//) is one of the essential preliminary steps of Buddhist practice. When practiced in itself, it is a basis of merit or wholesome kamma. When coupled with morality, concentration and insight, it leads ultimately to liberation from //samsara//, the cycle of repeated existence. Even those who are well-established on the path to emancipation continue to practice giving as it is conducive to wealth, beauty and pleasure in their remaining lifetimes. Bodhisattas complete the //danaparami// or perfection of giving to the ultimate degree by happily donating their limbs and their very lives to help other beings.

Like all good deeds, an act of giving will bring us happiness in the future, in accordance with the kammic law of cause and effect taught by the Buddha. Giving yields benefits in the present life and in lives to come whether or not we are aware of this fact, but when the volition is accompanied by understanding, we can greatly increase the merits earned by our gifts.

The amount of merit gained varies according to three factors: the quality of the donor's motive, the spiritual purity of the recipient, and the kind and size of the gift. Since we have to experience the results of our actions, and good deeds lead to good results and bad deeds to bad results, it is sensible to try to create as much good kamma as possible. In the practice of giving, this would mean keeping one's mind pure in the act of giving, selecting the worthiest recipients available, and choosing the most appropriate and generous gifts one can afford.

//The Factor of Volition//

The volition of the donor before, during and after the act of generosity is the most important of the three factors involved in the practice of giving: "If we have no control over our minds we will not choose proper gifts, the best recipient..., we will be unable to prepare them properly. And we may be foolish enough to regret having made them afterwards." [*] Buddhist teaching devotes special attention to the psychological basis of giving, distinguishing among the different states of mind with which one may give. A fundamental distinction is made between acts of giving that lack wisdom and those that are accompanied by wisdom, the latter being superior to the former. An example of a very elementary kind of giving would be the case of a young girl who places a flower on the household shrine simply because her mother tells her to do so, without having any idea of the significance of her act.

[*] U Chit Tin, //The Perfection of Generosity//, Introduction

Generosity associated with wisdom before, during and after the act is the highest type of giving. Three examples of wise giving are:

giving with the clear understanding that according to the kammic law of cause and effect, the generous act will bring beneficial results in the future; giving while aware that the gift, the recipient and the giver are all impermanent; and giving with the aim of enhancing one's efforts to become enlightened. As the giving of a gift takes a certain amount of time, a single act of giving may be accompanied by each of these three types of understanding at a different stage in the process.

The most excellent motive for giving is the intention that it strengthens ones efforts to attain Nibbana. Liberation is achieved by eliminating all the mental defilements (//kilesa//), which are rooted in the delusion of a controlling and lasting "I." Once this illusion is eradicated, selfish thoughts can no longer arise. If we aspire to ultimate peace and purity by practicing generosity, we will be developing the //dana parami//, the perfection of giving, building up a store of merit that will bear its full fruit with our attainment of enlightenment. As we progress towards that goal, the volition involved in acts of giving will assist us by contributing towards the pliancy of the mind, an essential asset in developing concentration and wisdom, the prime requisites of liberation.

Ariyas -- noble ones, those who have attained any of the four stages of holiness -- always give with pure volition because their minds function on the basis of wisdom. Those below this level sometimes give carelessly or disrespectfully, with unwholesome states of mind. The Buddha teaches that in the practice of giving, as in all bodily and verbal conduct, it is the volition accompanying the act that determines its moral quality. If one is offering something to a monk, doing so without adopting a respectful manner would not be proper. Throwing a coin to a beggar in order to get rid of him would also be considered a defilement of giving. One should think carefully about the relevance and the timing of a gift for it to bring the best results. A gift given through an intermediary -- for example, having a servant give food to a monk rather than giving it by one's own hand -- also detracts from the value of the gift. When one gives without realizing that one must experience the results of one's deeds, an act of giving again diminishes in meritorious potency.

If one only plans on giving a donation but does not fulfill one's plan, the merit earned will be very slight. Thus we should always follow up our intentions of generosity expeditiously, unless something intervenes to prevent our doing so. If, after having given a gift, we should subsequently regret our action, much of the merit of the deed will be lost.

A moral person gives politely and respectfully. Whether the gift is spontaneous or planned, he or she will make sure that the timing and contents of the gift are appropriate for the receiver. Many housewives in Buddhist countries regularly invite a few monks to their homes to receive almsfood early in the day. Before feeding the family, these women always offer the food to the bhikkhus with their own hands.

One might contribute to a certain cause from fear that friends would disapprove if one did not give. Giving in response to such social pressures will have weak, though still beneficial, results. Charitable actions undertaken to gain a good reputation are also selfish and hence not a very valuable kind of giving. Nor can it be praiseworthy when one gives merely to return a favor or in expectation of a reward. The former is like repaying a debt, the latter analogous to offering a bribe.

//The Recipient of Gifts//

The purity of the recipient is another factor which helps determine the kammic fruitfulness of a gift. The worthier the receiver, the greater the benefits that will come to the donor; hence it is good to give to the holiest people available. The Buddha teaches that the worthiest recipients of gifts are the ariyas, the noble ones, such as the Buddha himself and those of his disciples who have reached supramundane paths and fruits; for it is their purity of mind, attained by wisdom, that makes the act of giving capable of yielding abundant benefits. Therefore, to earn the maximum merit, we should give as much as we can, and as often as possible, to the noble ones.

Gifts to a bhikkhu who strives for the state of a noble one, or to a Buddhist meditator who lives by the Five Precepts, will also yield bountiful results.

When ariyas accept offerings, they do so to provide an opportunity for the donor to earn merit. Non-returners and Arahats in particular, who have attained the two highest stages of sanctity, have eliminated desire for sense objects. Thus when they are given gifts their minds remain detached from the objects presented and are filled with compassion for the giver.

The story of Sivali in the Dhammapada Commentary [*] is an example of the great merit which even a small gift can yield when presented to the Sangha led by the Buddha. At the time of Vipassi Buddha, the citizens of a country were competing with their king to see who could make the greatest offering to the Buddha and Sangha. The citizens had obtained everything for their offering except fresh honey, and they sent out messengers, each with plenty of money, to buy the missing ingredient.

[*] E.W. Burlingame, trans. //Buddhist Legends// (London: Pali Text Society, 1969), 2:212-16

One of these men met a villager who happened to be bringing a newly harvested honeycomb into the city for sale. The messenger was only able to buy it from the peasant when he had offered his entire allowance of a thousand pieces of money, which was far more than a single honeycomb was worth. The villager said: "Are you crazy?... This honey isn't worth a farthing but you offer me a thousand pieces of money for it. What is the explanation for this?" The other man told him that the honey was worth so much to him because it was the final item on the menu for the citizens' offering to the Buddha. The peasant spontaneously replied, "If that is the case, I will not sell it to you for a price; if I may receive the merit of the offering, I will give it to you." The citizens were impressed with the faith of this man who so readily gave up a windfall and enthusiastically agreed that he should receive the merit of the offering.

Because of this simple gift at the time of the Vipassi Buddha, the villager was reborn numerous times in celestial planes and the became the prince who inherited the throne of Benares. In his final lifetime, he became the Elder Sivali and attained Arahatship as a disciple of the present Buddha. Even after that, his gift of the honeycomb continued to bear fruit. To honor the one who had made the sweet gift aeons before, the gods provided lodging and food for the Buddha and five hundred of his monks, including Sivali, when for several days they had been walking along a deserted road.

The practice of giving is also beneficial when directed to someone who is not spiritually advanced. If the donor's intention is good, then even though the receiver is immoral, the donor will earn merit and further, by his act of giving, he will strengthen within himself his own disposition to renunciation. A gift mentally offered to the noble Sangha but physically presented to a monk who is morally corrupt will still bear great fruit. To be sure, we should not pretend that a bad person is good, but we must be most careful of our own attitude while giving, as our attitude is the factor over which we have most control.

//The Objects to be Given//

The third factor involved in giving is the gift itself, which can be either material or immaterial. //Dhamma-dana//, the gift of the noble teachings, is said by the Buddha to excel all other gifts (Dhammapada, 354). Those who expound his teachings -- monks who preach sermons or recite from the Tipitaka, teachers of meditation -- frequently share the Truth, thus practicing the highest kind of generosity. Those of us who are not qualified to teach the Dhamma can give the gift of the Dhamma in other ways. We can donate Dhamma books or pay for the translation or publication of a rare or new manuscript propagating the Buddha-Word. We can discuss the Dhamma informally and encourage others to keep precepts or to take up meditation. We might write an explanation of some aspect of the Dhamma for the benefit of others. Giving cash or labor to a meditation center or helping support a meditation teacher can also be considered the gift of the Dhamma, as the purpose of the center and the teacher is the transmission of the Buddha's teaching.

The most common type of gift is material things. A material object need not have a high monetary value for it to bring great results, as the story of Sivali and the honeycomb illustrates. If a poor man gives a monk the cup of rice that was to be his only food for the day, the man is making a great donation which may bear abundant fruit, while if a prosperous merchant, knowing in advance that the monk was coming for alms, were to give the same small portion of rice, he would reap meager fruits. We should try to give things whose quality is at least as good as those we use ourselves, like the people of Burma, who buy the best fruits on the market as gifts for the monks although these fruits are much too expensive for them to consume themselves.

Gifts to the Sangha may consist of food, robes, medicine or monasteries, each of which has a wide range. The limits are set by the rules of the Vinaya to keep the Bhikkhu Sangha pure and strong. Lay people who understand the monks' rules can earn vast merit by donating the proper things at the proper time to the order of monks and nuns.

A story about Visakha, the Buddha's chief woman lay disciple, offers a delightful illustration of the results of large-scale charity. [*]
When Visakha was to be married, elaborate preparations and gifts were arranged by her father. He gave her five hundred cartloads each of money, of gold, silver and copper implements. Then he decided that she must also take cattle with her. He gave orders to his men to allow out of their pen just as many animals as would fill a particular lane. When the cows has filed out and stood close together in that road, he had the corral closed, saying, "These cattle are enough for my daughter." However, after the gate had been latched securely, powerful bulls and milk cows jumped over the barrier to join the animals going with Visakha. Her father's servants could not keep them inside no matter how hard they tried.

[*] //Buddhist Legends//, 2:67-68.

All these cattle came to Visakha because, in a former lifetime long ago at the time of the Buddha Kassapa, she had given a generous gift of five kinds of dairy products to a company of 20,000 monks and novices. As the youngest of the seven daughters of King Kiki of Benares, she continued to urge the monks to take more milk, curds, ghee, etc., even when they said they had eaten enough. That gift earned her the merit of having such a large number of cattle go along with her at her marriage in the lifetime when she was Visakha, and no one could prevent this merit from bearing its fruit.

Material gifts of a religious nature would include contributions towards the erection of a new temple or shrine, gold leaf to help gild the umbrella of a shrine, or the purchase of a Buddha statue for a temple. The recipients of such gifts are the general public -- whoever comes to the temple or worships before the Buddha image.

Mundane gifts to the citizens of one's town would include donations to various welfare organizations, a contribution to a hospital or public library, keeping a neighborhood park neat and clean. If one does not merely contribute funds for such projects but provides physical labor as well, the kammic results will be even greater. Gifts of this sort can be quite meritorious if preceded, accompanied and followed by pure mental volitions.

//The Perfection of Giving//

There is a mode of giving which completely disregards the qualities of the recipient and even the mundane fruits of the merit acquired by giving. Such generosity springs from the motive of renunciation, the thought of eliminating one's attachment to one's possessions, and thus aims at giving away the dearest and most difficult gifts. Bodhisattas give in this manner whenever the opportunity presents itself, strictly in order to fulfill the //danaparami//, the "perfection of giving," which is the first of the ten perfections they must cultivate to the highest degree in order to attain Buddhahood. A Bodhisatta's work to complete the perfection of giving demands much more of him than other beings could emulate. Many Jataka tales relate how the Bodhisatta who was to become the Buddha Gotama gave things away with absolutely no thought of himself or of the mundane benefits that might follow. A Bodhisatta's only concern in practicing generosity is to fulfill the requirements for Buddhahood.

The //Basket of Conduct// [*] contains ten stories of the Bodhisatta's former lives. In one of these lifetimes he was a brahmin named Sankha who saw a Paccekabuddha, or non-teaching enlightened one, walking barefoot on a desert path. Sankha thought to himself, "Desiring merit, seeing one eminently worthy of a gift of faith, if I do not give him a gift, I will dwindle in merit." So the brahmin, who had a very delicate constitution, presented his sandals to the Paccekabuddha even though his own need for them was greater (Division I, Story 2).

[*] Cariyapitaka, translated by I.B. Horner, included in //Minor Anthologies of the Pali Canon//, Part III (London: Pali Text Society, 1975).

Another time the Bodhisatta was a great emperor named Maha-Sudassana. He had criers proclaim several times every day, in thousands of places throughout his empire, that anyone who wanted anything would be given it if he just came there and asked. "If there came a mendicant beggar, whether by day or by night, receiving whatever goods he wanted, he went away with hands full." Maha-Sudassana gave with completely openhanded generosity, "without attachment, expecting nothing in return, for the attainment of Self-Awakening" (I,4).

A Bodhisatta must give more difficult gifts than material goods to fulfill the highest form of the perfection of generosity. He must freely give the parts of his body, his children, his wife, and even his own life. As King Sivi, our Bodhisatta plucked out both his eyes with his bare hands and gave them to Sakka, the king of the gods. Sakka had come to Sivi in the guise of a blind old man, just to provide him with the opportunity to make this remarkable gift. Sivi did this with no hesitation prior to the act, nor with any reluctance during the act, nor with any hint of regret afterwards. He said that this gift was made "for the sake of Awakening itself. The two eyes were not disagreeable to me. Omniscience was dear to me, therefore I gave my eyes" (I,8).

As Prince Vessantara, the Bodhisatta gave the auspicious, powerful royal elephant to the people of a rival kingdom merely because they had requested it. As a result of this liberality, he and his wife and two small children were banished to a remote mountain. They lived there in the forest, Vessantara tending his son and daughter in their hut while his wife spent the days gathering the wild fruits on which they lived. One day a traveler chanced by and asked the Bodhisatta to give him the children. Vessantara gave them away without any hesitation at all. Later he gave away his virtuous wife too. "Neither child was disagreeable to me, the Lady Maddi was not disagreeable. Omniscience was dear to me, therefore I gave away those who were dear" (I, 9). It should be noted that at that time, a man's children and wife were generally considered his property. Ages before, the Lady Maddi had aspired to be the wife of the Bodhisatta and to share whatever trials he had to undergo along the path to Buddhahood. The result of her own kamma complemented Prince Vessanatara's volition and led to her being given away. Their children must also have been experiencing the results of their own past deeds when they had to leave their parents.

Another time the Bodhisatta took birth as a wise hare. That existence came to an end when, joyously, he jumped into a fire after inviting a famished brahmin (again, Sakka in disguise) to eat him roasted. Because of the purity of the Bodhisatta's mind while making this highest gift of his entire body and life, the blazing fire did not hurt him as it burned his flesh. In relating the story he said that, in fact, the fire had calmed him and brought him peace as if it had been cool water, because he had accomplished the complete perfection of giving.

//The Ultimate Goal of Giving//

The goal of the Buddhist path is emancipation from the suffering of repeated existence in samsara. The Buddha taught that uprooting ignorance and the mental defilements it nurtures will bring us to Nibbana, the utter cessation of suffering. Unwholesome mental tendencies make us cling to what we mistakenly take to be our "selves," they keep us struggling to satisfy our insatiable sense desires with objects that are inherently transitory and thus unsatisfying.

The Buddha said that the practice of giving will aid us in our efforts to purify the mind. Generous gifts accompanied by wholesome volition help to eradicate suffering in three ways. First, when we decide to give something of our own to someone else, we simultaneously reduce our attachment to the object; to make a habit of giving can thus gradually weaken the mental factor of craving, one of the main causes of unhappiness. Second, giving accompanied by wholesome volition will lead to happy future births in circumstances favorable to encountering and practicing the pure Buddha Dhamma. Third, and most important, when giving is practiced with the intention that the mind becomes pliant enough for the attainment of Nibbana, the act of generosity will help us develop virtue, concentration and wisdom (//sila//, //samadhi//, //panna//) right in the present. These three stages make up the Buddha's Noble Eightfold Path, and perfecting the path leads to the extinction of suffering.

If we give in the hope of winning luxury in future lives, we may attain our aim providing that we adhere to the principles of virtuous conduct. According to the Buddha, however, the motivation of working for liberation is far superior to that of aiming at mundane happiness in future births. This is because a gift made with the desire for pleasure is accompanied in part by the unwholesome psychological root craving (//tanha//). The merits earned by such gifts are exhausted in transient pleasure, and such mundane happiness keeps us revolving in the round of rebirth, which in the deepest sense is always //dukkha//, subject to suffering. Giving associated with craving cannot contribute to the one form of happiness that does not perish, release from the round, which comes only with the full elimination of craving. Gifts untainted by craving and attachment can only be made during a Buddha Sasana, the period when the teachings of a Buddha are available. So when we give now, during such a time, we should do so with the aim of putting an end to craving. With the end of craving, suffering ceases, and that is liberation.

May the merits of this gift of the Dhamma be shared by all beings!

GIVING IN THE PALI CANON

Lily de Silva

//Dana//, giving, is extolled in the Pali Canon as a great virtue. It is, in fact, the beginning of the path to liberation. When the Buddha preaches to a newcomer he starts his graduated sermon with an exposition on the virtues of giving (//danakatha//, Vin.i,15,18). Of the three bases for the performance of meritorious deeds (//punnakiriyavatthu//), giving is the first, the other two being virtue and mental culture (A.iv,241). It is also the first of the ten //paramita// perfected by a Buddha. Therefore, on the march towards liberation as an Arahant or a Buddha, one initially has to practice //dana//.

//Function of Giving//

Giving is of prime importance in the Buddhist scheme of mental purification because it is the best weapon against greed (//lobha//), the first of the three unwholesome motivational roots (//akusalamula//). Greed is wrapt up with egoism and selfishness, since we hold our personalities and our possessions as "I" and "mine". Giving helps make egoism thaw: it is the antidote to cure the illness of egoism and greed. "Overcome the taint of greed and practice giving," exhorts the Devatasamyutta (S.i,18). The Dhammapada admonishes us to conquer miserliness with generosity (//jine kadariyam danena//, Dhp. 223).

It is difficult to exercise this virtue of giving proportionate to the intensity of one's greed and selfishness. As such the Devatasamyutta equates giving to a battle (//danan ca yuddhan ca samanam ahu//, S.i,20). One has to fight the evil forces of greed before one can make up one's mind to give away something dear and useful to oneself. The Latukikopama Sutta illustrates how a man lacking in spiritual strength finds it hard to give up a thing he has been used to (M.i, 449). A small quail can come to death when it gets entangled even in a useless rotten creeper. Though weak, a rotten creeper is a great bond for the small bird. But even an iron chain is not too big a bond for a strong elephant. Similarly, a poor wretched man of weak character would find it difficult to part with his shabby meager belongings, while a strong-charactered king will even give up a kingdom once convinced of the dangers of greed.

Miserliness is not the only hindrance to giving. Carelessness and ignorance of the working of kamma and survival after death are equally valid causes (//macchera ca pamada ca evam danam na diyati//, S.i,18). If one knows the moral advantages of giving, one will be vigilant to seize opportunities to practice this great virtue. Once the Buddha said that if people only knew the value of giving as he does, they would not take a single meal without sharing their food with others (It.p,18).

//Qualities of the Donor//

The suttas (e.g. D.i,137) employ a number of terms to describe the qualities of a donor. He is a man with faith (//saddha//), he has faith in the nobility of a morally sound life, in the teachings of kamma and survival after death. He believes in the possibility of the moral and spiritual perfection of man. In short, he is not a materialist, and he has faith in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha. He is not merely a giver (//dayako//), he is a lordly giver (//danapati//). The commentary explains the concept of "lordly giver" in the following words: "He who himself enjoys delicious things but gives to others what is not delicious is a donor who is a slave to the gifts he gives. He who gives things of the same quality as he himself enjoys is one who is like a friend of the gift. He who satisfies himself with whatever he can get but gives delicacies to others is a lordly giver, a senior and a master of the gifts given."

The donor is also described as one who keeps an open house for the needy (//anavatadvaro//). He is like a wellspring (//opanabhuto//) for recluses, brahmins, the destitute, wayfarers, wanderers and beggars. Being such a one he does meritorious deeds. He is munificent (//muttacago//) and is interested in sharing his blessings with others (//danasamvibhagarato//). He is a philanthropist who understands the difficulties of the poor (//vadannu//). He is open-handed and is ready to comply with another's request (//payatapani//). He is one fit to be asked from (//yacayogo//). He takes delight in distributing gifts to the needy (//vossaggarato//), and has a heart bent on giving (//cagaparibhavitacitto//). Such are the epithets used in the suttas to describe the qualities of the liberal-minded.

A noble giver is one who is happy before, during and after giving (A.iii,336). Before giving he is happy anticipating the opportunity to exercise his generosity. While giving he is happy that he is making another happy by fulfilling a need. After giving he is satisfied that he has done a good deed. The suttas list generosity as one of the important qualities that go to make a gentleman (A.iv,220). The Buddha compares the man who righteously earns his wealth and gives of it to the needy to a man who has both eyes, whereas the one who only earns wealth but does no merit is like a one-eyed man (A.i,129-30). The wealthy man who enjoys his riches by himself without sharing is said to be digging his own grave (Sn. 102).

//The Donations//

Practically anything useful can be given as a gift. The Niddesa (ND.2, 523) gives a list of fourteen items that are fit to be given for charity. They are robes, almsfood, dwelling places, medicine and other requisites for the sick, food, drink, cloths, vehicles, garlands, perfume, unguent, beds, houses and lamps. It is not necessary to have much to practice generosity, for one can give according to one's means. Gifts given from one's meager resources are considered very valuable (//appasma dakkhina dinna sahassena samam mita//, S.i,18; //dajjappasmim pi yacito//, Dhp. 224). If a person leads a righteous life even though he ekes out a bare existence on gleanings, looks after his family according to his means, but makes it a point to give from his limited stores, his generosity is worth more than a thousand sacrifices (S.i, 19-20). Alms given from wealth righteously earned is greatly praised by the Buddha (A.iii,354; It.p.66; A.iii,45-46). A householder who does so is said to be one who is lucky here and hereafter. In the Magha Sutta of the Sutta Nipata (Sn.p.87) the Buddha highly appreciates Magha who says that he earns through righteous means and liberally gives of it to the needy.

Even if one gives a small amount with a heart full of faith one can gain happiness hereafter. The Vimanavattha supplies ample examples. According to the Acamadayikavimanavatthu, the alms given consisted of a little rice crust, but as it was given with great devotion to an eminent Arahant, the reward was rebirth in a magnificent celestial mansion. The Dakkhainavibhanga Sutta states that an offering is purified on account of the giver when the giver is virtuous, on account of the recipient when the recipient is virtuous, on account of both the giver and the recipient if both are virtuous, by none if both happen to be impious. //Dhammadana//, the dissemination of the knowledge of the Dhamma, is said to excel all other forms of giving (//sabbadanam dhammadanam jinati//, Dhp.354).

The Anguttara Nikaya mentions five great gifts which have been held in high esteem by noble-minded men from ancient times (A.iv,246).

Their value was not doubted in ancient times, it is not doubted at present, nor will it be doubted in the future. The wise recluses and brahmins had the highest respect for them. These great givings comprise the meticulous observance of the Five Precepts. By doing so one gives fearlessness, love and benevolence to all beings. If one human being can give security and freedom from fear to others by his behavior, that is the highest form of //dana// one can give, not only to mankind, but to all living beings.

//The Donee//

The suttas also describe the person to whom alms should be given (A.iii, 41). Guests, travellers and the sick should be treated with hospitality and due consideration. During famines the needy should be liberally entertained. The virtuous should be first entertained with the first fruits of fresh crops. There is a recurrent phrase in the suttas (D.i, 137; ii,354; iii,76) describing those who are particularly in need of public generosity. They are recluses (//samana//), brahmins (//brahmana//), destitutes (//kapana//), wayfarers (//addhika//), wanderers (//vanibbaka//) and beggars (//yacaka//). The recluses and brahmins are religious persons who do not earn wages. They give spiritual guidance to the laity and the laity is expected to support them. The poor need the help of the rich to survive and the rich become spiritually richer by helping the poor. At a time when transport facilities were meager and amenities for travellers were not adequately organized, the public had to step in to help the wayfarer. Buddhism considers it a person's moral obligation to give assistance to all these types of people.

In the Anguttara Nikaya the Buddha describes, with sacrificial terminology, three types of fires that should be tended with care and honor (A.iv,44). They are //ahuneyyaggi//, //gahapataggi// and //dakkhineyyaggi//. The Buddha explained that //ahuneyyaggi// means one's parents, and they should be honored and cared for. //Gahapataggi// means one's wife and children, employees and dependents. //Dakkineyyaggi// represents religious persons who have either attained the goal of Arahantship or have embarked on a course of training for the elimination of negative mental traits. All these should be cared for and looked after as one would tend a sacrificial fire. According to the Mahamangala Sutta, offering hospitality to one's relatives is one of the great auspicious deeds a layperson can perform (Sn. 262-63).

King Kosala once asked the Buddha to whom alms should be given (S.i,98). The Buddha replied that alms should be given to those by giving to whom one becomes happy. Then the king asked another question: To whom should alms be offered to obtain great fruit? The Buddha discriminated the two as different questions and replied that alms offered to the virtuous bears great fruit. He further clarified that offerings yield great fruit when made to virtuous recluses who have eliminated the five mental hindrances (//nivarana//) and culivated moral habits, concentration, wisdom, emancipation and knowledge and vision of emancipation (//sila//, //samadhi//, //panna//, //vimutti//, //vimuttinanadassana//).

In the Sakkasamyutta (S.i,233) Sakka asked the same question from the Buddha: Gifts given to whom bring the greatest result? The Buddha replied that what is given to the Sangha bears great results. Here the Buddha specifies that what he means by "Sangha" is the community of those upright noble individuals who have entered the path and who have established themselves in the fruit of saintship, and who are endowed with morality, concentration and wisdom. It is important to note that "Sangha" according to the Vinaya means a sufficient group of monks to represent the Order of monks for various ecclesiastical purposes (Vin. i,319). But in the suttas "Sangha" means the four pairs of noble individuals or the eight particular individuals (//cattari purisayugani//, //attha purisapuggala//), i.e., those who are on the path to stream-entry, once-returning, non-returning, and Arahantship, and those who have obtained the fruits thereof.

The Magha Sutta (Sn.p.86) gives a detailed account of the virtues of the Arahant to show to whom alms should be offered by one desiring merit. The Brahmanasamyutta (S.i,175) maintains that offerings bear greatest results when they are made to those who know their previous lives, who have seen heavens and hells, who have put an end to birth and who have realized ultimate knowledge. Thus the Sangha comprising morally perfect, worthy personages as described in the suttas constitutes the field of merit (//punnakkhetta//, M.i,447). Just as seeds sown in fertile well-watered fields yields bountiful crops, alms given to the virtuous established on the Noble Eightfold Path yield great results (A.iv,238; i,162). The Dhammapada maintains that fields have weeds as their blemish; lust, hatred, delusion and desire are the blemishes of people and therefore what is given to those who have eliminated those blemishes bears great fruit (Dhp. 356-59). The results of generosity are measured more by the quality of the field of merit represented by the recipient than by the quantity and value of the gift given.

The Anguttara Nikaya (A.iv,392-95) records a fabulous alms-giving conducted by the Bodhisatta when he was born as a brahmin named Velama. Lavish gifts of silver, gold, elephants, cows, carriages, etc., not to mention food, drink and clothing, were distributed among everybody who came forward to receive them. But this open-handed munificence was not very valuable as far as merit was concerned because there were no worthy recipients. It is said to be more meritorious to feed one person with right view, a stream-enterer (//sotapanna//), than to give great alms such as that given by Velama. It is more meritorious to feed one once-returner than a hundred stream-enterers. Next in order come non-returners, Arahants, Paccekabuddhas and Sammasambuddhas. Feeding the Buddha and the Sangha is more meritorious than feeding the Buddha alone. It is even more meritorious to construct a monastery for the general use of the Sangha of the four quarters of all times. Taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha is better still. Abiding by the Five Precepts is even more valuable. But better still is the cultivation of //metta//, loving-kindness, and best of all, the insight into impermanence, which leads to Nibbana.

//The Motivation for Giving//

The suttas record various motives for exercising generosity. The Anguttara Nikaya (A.iv,236) enumerates the following eight motives:

1. //Asajja danam deti//: one gives with annoyance, or as a way of offending the recipient, or with the idea of insulting him. [*]

2. //Bhaya danam deti//: fear also can motivate a person to make an offering.

3. //Adasi me ti danam deti//: one gives in return for a favor done to oneself in the past.

4. //Dassati me ti danam deti// one also may give with the hope of getting a similar favor for oneself in the future.

5. //Sadhu danan ti danam deti//: one gives because giving is considered good.

6. //Aham pacami, ime ne pacanti, na arahami pacanto apacantanam adatun ti danam deti//: "I cook, they do not cook. It is not proper for me who cooks not to give to those who do not cook." Some give urged by such altruistic motives.

7. //Imam me danam dadato kalyano kittisaddo abbhuggacchati ti danam deti//: some give alms to gain a good reputation.

8. //Cittalankara-cittaparikkarattham danam deti//: still others give alms to adorn and beautify the mind.

[*] Though the PTS translation reads "one gives alms on one's own accord," the accuracy of this translation is questionable. The sutta seems to record motives for giving in ascending order of refinement. If the PTS translation is accepted, the order is disturbed. Moreover, //asajja// is the gerund of //asadeti//, which means to strike, offend, assail, insult.

Favoritism (//chanda//), ill will (//dosa//) and delusion (//moha//) are also listed as motives for giving. Sometimes alms are given for the sake of maintaining a long-standing family tradition. Desire to be reborn in heaven after death is another dominant motive. Giving pleases some and they give with the idea of winning a happy frame of mind (A.iv, 236).

But it is maintained in the suttas (A.iv,62) that alms should be given without any expectations (//na sapekho danam deti//). Nor should alms be given with attachment to the recipient. If one gives with the idea of accumulating things for later use, that is an inferior act of giving. If one gives with the hope of enjoying the result thereof after death, that is also an inferior act of giving. The only valid motive for giving should be the motive of adorning the mind, to rid the mind of the ugliness of greed and selfishness.

//The Manner of Giving//

The suttas (e.g. A.iii,172) lay much emphasis on the manner of giving. The attitude of the donor in the act of giving makes a world of difference for the goodwill between the donor and recipient irrespective of whether the gift given is big or small. //Sakkaccam danam deti//: alms should be given in such a way that the donee does not feel humiliated, belittled or hurt. The needy ask for something with a sense of embarrassment, and it is the duty of the donor not to make him feel more embarrassed and make his already heavy burden still heavier. //Cittikatva danam deti//: alms should be given with due consideration and respect. The recipient should be make to feel welcome. It is when a gift is given with such warmth that a cohesive mutually enriching friendliness emerges between the donor and donee. //Sahattha deti//: one should give with one's own hand. The personal involvement in the act of giving is greatly beneficial. This promotes rapport between the donor and donee and that is the social value of giving. Society is welded in unity with care and concern for one another when generosity is exercised with a warm sense of personal involvement. //Na apaviddham deti//: one should not give as alms what is only fit to be thrown away. One should be careful to give only what is useful and appropriate. //Na anagamanaditthiko deti//: one should not give in such a callous manner so as to make the donee not feel like coming again.

Giving with faith (//saddhaya deti//) is much extolled in the suttas (A.iii,172). Especially when offering alms to the clergy one should do so with due deference and respect, taking delight in the opportunity one has got to serve them. Once should also give at the proper time to meet a dire need (//kalena deti//). Such timely gifts are most valuable as they relieve the anxiety and stress of the supplicant. One should give with altruistic concerns, with the sole intention of helping another in difficulty (//anuggahacitto danam deti//). In the act of giving one should take care not to hurt oneself or another (//attanan ca paran ca anupahacca danam deti//). Giving with understanding and discretion is praised by the Buddha (//viceyyadanam sugatappasattham//). If a gift contributes to the well-being of the donee it is wise to give. But if the gift is detrimental to the welfare of the donee one should be careful to exercise one's discretion. Giving as described above is highly commended as noble giving (//sappurisadana//). More than what is given, it is the manner of giving that makes a gift valuable. One may not be able to afford a lavish gift, but one can always make the recipient feel cared for by the manner of giving.

//The Value of Giving//

Many suttas enumerate the various benefits of giving. Giving promotes social cohesion and solidarity. It is the best means of bridging the psychological gap, much more than the material economic gap, that exists between haves and have-nots. The Magha Sutta maintains that hates gets eliminated when one is established in generosity (Sn. 506). The one with a generous heart earns the love of others and many associate with him (A.iii,40). Giving also cements friendships (Sn. 187).

It is maintained that if a person makes an aspiration to be born in a particular place after giving alms, the aspiration will be fulfilled only if he is virtuous, but not otherwise (A.iv,239). According to one sutta (A.iv,241-43), if one practices giving and morality to a very limited degree and has no idea about meditation, one obtains an unfortunate birth in the human world. One who performs meritorious deeds such as giving and morality to a considerable degree, but does not understand anything about meditation, meets a fortunate human birth. But those who practice giving and morality to a great extent without any knowledge of meditation find rebirth in one of the heavens. They excel other deities in the length of life, beauty, pleasure, fame and the five strands of sense pleasure.

The Anguttara Nikaya (A.iv,79) enumerates a number of this-worldly benefits of giving. The generous person, and not the miser, wins the sympathy of others. Arahants approach him, accept alms and preach to him first. A good reputation spreads about him. He can attend any assembly with confidence and dignity. He is reborn in a state of happiness after death. Another sutta (A.iii,41) adds that a generous person wins popularity; people of noble character associate with him and he has the satisfaction of having fulfilled a layperson's duties (//gihidhamma anapeto hoti//).

It is said that an almsgiver bestows on others life, beauty, happiness, strength and intelligence. Having bestowed them on others, he becomes a beneficiary of them himself (A.iii,42). The same idea is expressed by the succinct statement that one reaps what one sows (//yadisam vapate bijam tadisam harate phalam//, S.i,227).

Giving with faith results in the attainment of riches and beauty whenever the fruition of the gift occurs. By giving alms with due deference one gains, in addition, children, wives, subordinates and servants who are obedient, dutiful and understanding. By giving alms at the proper time not only does one obtain great wealth but also timely fulfillment of needs. By giving alms with the genuine desire to help others, one gains great wealth and the inclination to enjoy the best of sense pleasures. By giving alms without hurting oneself and others, one gains security from dangers such as fire, floods, thieves, kings and unloved heirs (A. iii,172).

Alms given to recluses and brahmins who follow the Noble Eightfold Path yield wonderful results just as seeds sown on fertile, well-prepared, well-watered fields produce abundant crops (A.iv,238). Alms given without any expectations whatsoever can lead to birth in the Brahma-world, at the end of which one may become a non-returner (A.iv,62).

The Dakkhinavibhanga Sutta enumerates a list of persons to whom alms can be offered and the merit accruing therefrom in ascending order. A thing given to an animal brings a reward a hundredfold. A gift given to an ordinary person of poor moral habit yields a reward a thousandfold; a gift given to a virtuous person yields a reward a hundred thousandfold. When a gift is given to a person outside the dispensation of Buddhism who is without attachment to sense pleasures, the yield is a hundred thousandfold of crores. When a gift is given to one on the path to stream-entry the yield is incalculable and immeasurable. So what can be said of a gift given to a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, an Arahant, a Paccekabuddha, and a Fully Enlightened Buddha?

The same sutta emphasizes that a gift given to the Sangha as a group is more valuable than a gift offered to a single monk in his individual capacity. It is said that in the distant future there will be Buddhist monks who wear only a yellow collar as a distinguishing clerical mark, who are immoral and of evil character. If a gift is offered even to such monks in the name of the Order, it yields much more merit than a gift given to a monk in his individual capacity. But it should be observed that this statement is contradictory to ideas expressed elsewhere, that what is given to the virtuous is greatly beneficial but not what is given to the immoral. It is evident here that a later interpolation cannot be altogether ruled out.

The Buddha once explained that it is a meritorious act even to throw away the water after washing one's plate with the generous thought: "May the particles of food in the washing water be food to the creatures on the ground." When that is so, how much more meritorious it is to feed a human being! But the sutta hastens to add that it is more meritorious to feed a virtuous person (A.i,161).

Another sutta (A.iii,336) maintains that it is not possible to estimate the amount of merit that accrues when an offering is endowed with six particular characteristics. Three of the characteristics belong to the donor while three belong to the donee. The donor should be happy at the thought of giving prior to making the offering. He should be pleased at the time of making the offering, and he should be satisfied after the offering is made. Thus the nobility of thought -- without a trace of greed before, during and after the offering -- makes a gift truly great. The recipients also should be free from lust, hatred and delusion, or they should have embarked on a course of training for the elimination of these mental depravities. When an almsgiving is endowed with these qualities of the donor and donee, the merit is said to be as immeasurable as the waters in the ocean.

Once Visakha gave a learned explanation of the benefits she expected from her munificence when the Buddha questioned her as to what she saw as the advantages of her great generosity (Vin.i,293-94). She said that when she hears that a particular monk or nun has attained any of the fruits of recluseship, and if that monk or nun has visited Savatthi, she would be certain that he or she has partaken of the offerings she constantly makes. When she reflects that she has contributed in some measure to his or her spiritual distinction, great delight (//pamujja/) arises in her. Joy (//piti//) arises in the mind that is delighted. When the mind is joyful the body relaxes (//kayo passambhissati//). When the body relaxes a sense of ease (//sukha//) is experienced which helps the mind to be concentrated (//cittam samadhiyissati//). That will help the development of the spiritual faculties (//indriyabhavana//), spiritual powers (//balahbavana//), and factors of enlightenment (//bojjhangabhavana//). These are the advantages she hopes for by her munificence. The Buddha was so pleased with her erudite reply that he exclaimed, "Sadhu sadhu sadhu" in approbation.

It is evident that giving alone is not sufficient for one to make an end of suffering. Anathapindika, who was pronounced by the Buddha as the foremost among almsgivers, became only a stream-enterer. It is specifically said that //dana// has to be fortified by //sila//, morality, if it is to produce good results. Though Anathapindika practiced unblemished virtue, it is nowhere stated that he practiced mental culture or meditation (//bhavana//). Therefore, in spite of all his magnanimous munificence, he had to remain a stream-enterer.

The //Ghatikara Sutta// (M.ii,52) records a unique almsgiving where even the donor was not present. Chatikara the potter was the chief benefactor of the Buddha Kassapa. He was a non-returner who did not want to enter the Order as he was looking after his blind, aged parents. He had greatly won the trust of the Buddha by the nobility of his conduct and devotion. One day the Buddha Kassapa went to his house on his alms round but Ghatikara was out. He asked the blind parents where the potter had gone. They replied that he had gone out, but invited the Buddha to serve himself from the pots and pans and partake of a meal. The Buddha did so. When Ghatikara returned and inquired who had taken from the food, the parents informed him that the Buddha had come and they had requested him to help himself to a meal. Ghatikara was overjoyed to hear this as he felt that the Buddha had so much trust in him. It is said that the joy and happiness (//pitisukha//) he experienced did not leave him for two weeks, and the parents' joy and happiness did not wane for a whole week.

The same sutta reports that on another occasion the roof of the Buddha Kassapa's monastery started leaking. He sent the monks to Ghatikara's house to fetch some straw, but Ghatikara was out at the time. Monks came back and said that there was no straw available there except what was on the roof. The Buddha asked the monks to get the straw from the roof there. Monks started stripping the straw from the roof and the aged parents of Ghatikara asked who was removing the straw. The monks explained the matter and the parents said, "Please do take all the straw." When Ghatikara heard about this he was deeply moved by the trust the Buddha reposed in him. The joy and happiness that arose in him did not leave him for a full fortnight and that of his parents did not subside for a week. For three months Ghatikara's house remained without a roof with only the sky above, but it is said that the rain did not wet the house. Such was the great piety and generosity of Ghatikara.

As mentioned at the beginning of this essay, //dana// is the first of the meritorious deeds. It is also one of the four benevolent ways of treating others (//cattari sangahavatthuni//), A.iv,219). But is noteworthy that in the lists of virtues required for liberation such as those included among the thirty-seven requisites of enlightenment (//bodhipakkhiya dhamma//), //dana// never occurs as a required virtue. Instead of //dana//, //caga// or generosity is included in some of the lists, such as the five qualities -- faith virtue, learning, generosity and wisdom. Perhaps there is a slight difference between //dana// and //caga// when considered as virtues ingrained in the mind. //Dana// is the very practical act of giving, //caga// is the generous attitude ingrained in the mind by the repeated practice of //dana//. The word //caga// literally means giving up, abandonment, and it is an indication that the close-fitted selfish grip one has on one's possessions is loosened by //caga//. It is possible to give alms even out of negative motives such as favoritism (//chanda//), ill will (//dosa//), fear (//bhaya//), delusion (//moha//), desire for a good reputation, etc., but //caga// is the positive virtue of a generous disposition.

Buddhism teaches a gradual process of emptying oneself. It starts with giving away one's external possessions. When the generous dispositional trait sets in and is fortified by the deepening insight into the real nature of things, one grows disenchanted with sense pleasures (//nibbindati//). At this stage one gives up household life and seeks ordination. Next comes the emptying of sensory inputs by guarding the sense doors. Through meditation (//bhavana//) one empties oneself of deep-seated defilements and fills oneself with positive noble qualities. But this whole process of bailing out negativities starts with //dana//, the practice of giving.

GIVING FROM THE HEART

M. O'C. Walshe

Giving comes very naturally to some people -- they enjoy giving and are unhappy if they cannot do so. And though it is obvious that one can give foolishly, it is in general a very good and meritorious thing to give. This is recognized in, probably, all religions: in Christianity we are told that it is more blessed to give than to receive, and in Islam there is a positive injunction to give part of one's wealth to the poor.

Perhaps, however, we ought to start by squarely facing a point which may worry some people: the question of giving to the Sangha. In a phrase which lay Buddhists may frequently hear chanted, or even chant themselves, the Sangha is described as //anuttaram punnakkhettam lokassa//, "an unequalled field of merit-making for the world," meaning that the merit to be gained by giving to the Sangha is unequalled. Well of course, not all the lay people who hear or join in such chanting know what the words mean, but of those who do, Westerners who are Buddhists or Buddhist sympathizers sometimes react to this notion with a degree of indignation, considering the words tactless or worse! In fact some, whose conditioning was at least partly under the influence of the Lutheran Christian tradition, are reminded of the abuses to which Martin Luther objected in the Church of his day, when "good deeds" were very largely associated in the popular mind with maintaining priests and monks, who in some cases at least were idle and corrupt, in the style to which they were accustomed.

Such misgivings are perhaps understandable, but can be countered by a proper explanation, and will in any case not take root provided the Sangha is patently seen to be well conducted (//supatipanno//). The traditional Buddhist community consists of four groups: monks, nuns, male and female lay followers. Though the original order of nuns has died out, there are women who have undertaken the holy life and live virtually as nuns, and there is every indication that their numbers will grow. The relation between the first two groups and the latter two is one of symbiosis. After all, the Sangha has a priceless gift to give, the gift of the Dhamma. //Sabbadanam dhammadanam jinati//: "The gift of the Dhamma excels all other gifts" (Dhp. 354). Members of the Sangha also have an inescapable obligation to live according to the Vinaya and to strive continuously for enlightenment. It is in fact only by so doing that they can claim to be "an unequalled field of merit-making," and if they fail in this obligation they are letting down not only themselves but also the laity who support them. A monk or nun who cannot observe the rules should, and in certain cases must, leave the Order. This could be regarded, at least in part, as the price to be paid for abusing the generosity of lay supporters.

It was mentioned above that, according to the Bible, it is more blessed to give than to receive. It is interesting to note that, just as in the practice of //metta-bhavana//, the meditation on universal love, there is given an actual method for fulfilling that difficult Judaeo-Christian injunction "love thy neighbor as thyself," so too Buddhism can give a precise technical meaning to this biblical statement. If we receive something pleasant, this in Buddhism is considered to be //vipaka//, the result of previous meritorious conduct. It is nice while it lasts, but when it is finished, its virtue is exhausted. To give, however is //kusala kamma//, skilled action, which will be productive of some pleasant //vipaka// or result for the giver. In this way it can be clearly seen to be more "blessed" to give than to receive. True, this "blessing" remains purely mundane and limited, being "merit-making for the world" (//lokassa//). But as all our actions are habit-forming, giving once inclines us to give again, so that the result tends to be cumulative. Also, of course, this king of //kusala kamma// can lead on to other things, and it is not for nothing that //dana// is listed as the first among the ten //paramis// or "perfections," coming even before //sila// or morality. It is, after all, possible for an immoral person to be generous!

The late Dr. I.B.Horner selected ten Jataka stories to illustrate the ten perfections, in a little book that is widely used as an introductory Pali reader, and she used the delightful story of the self-sacrificing hare (No. 316) to illustrate the perfection of giving. Strangely enough, thought, to the Western mind at least, the most popular Jataka story on this them is the very last, the Vessantara Jataka (No. 547), in which the Bodhisatta gives everything away including, finally, his wife and children -- a distinctly dubious moral, one might think! But in Thailand this story has been singled out and is regularly made the subject of special readings and sermons for the edification of the laity.

Giving is something that comes from the heart, and as I have said, there are people who enjoy giving for its own sake -- which is fine provided the giving is balanced with wisdom. There are of course other people who are reluctant givers, and they are often the same people who find it difficult to say "please," "thank you," "I'm sorry," and so on. For all such types the //brahmavihara// meditations on love and compassion would be beneficial, to enable them to open up their hearts.

Recently, in Britain, we have had a magnificent example of the power of giving from the heart, and from what to many must have seemed an unexpected source. Moved by the plight of the starving people in Ethiopia, the rock star Bob Geldof organized the fantastic international Live Aid concert which raised millions of pounds -- in its way, and with the aid of modern technology, the most spectacular act of generosity in history, touching the hearts of millions, and transcending the boundaries not only of politics and religions, but also that gulf that exists between those addicted to this particular form of entertainment and those who dislike it.

It is perhaps hardly necessary to point out that //dana// has to be exercised with discretion, and is as much subject to the rule of the middle way as everything else. It is not the best way to bring up a child, for instance, to give it everything it wants -- or thinks it wants. Contrary to some trendy theories recently current, it does no harm to frustrate a spoilt brat occasionally! Nor, of course, is it the highest kind if giving if one expects something in return -- even a nice rebirth in some heavenly realm! That is a kind of giving which is basically rooted in attachment and is therefore of limited kammic value.

In point of fact, one of the true benefits to the giver is precisely that the act of spontaneous giving is a very fine way of helping to overcome attachment. And that is the intended point of the Vessantara story. We Westerners think of the unfortunate wife and family the Bodhisatta "sacrificed" (though of course there was happy ending and they came back to him, in the story!), but the intention is to regard them as objects of attachment, to be given up as such. As a matter of fact, despite the popularity of this particular story, modern scholars consider that it was not originally a Buddhist tale at all, and was somewhat unskillfully adapted to provide a "Buddhist" moral.

The more we consider the question of //dana//, the more aspects emerge, and we see that there are many ways of giving, skillfully or otherwise. We may conclude with an amusing canonical example of the alleged results of relatively unskillful giving. In the Payasi Sutta (No. 23 of the Digha Nikaya) we read of the debate between the skeptic Prince Payasi, who did not believe in an afterlife, and the Venerable Kumara-Kassapa. After listening to a brilliant series of parables from the monk, Payasi declares himself converted, and decides to establish a charity "for ascetics and brahmins, wayfarers, beggars and the needy," and he appoints the young brahmin Uttara to organize the distribution. (N.B. This is the correct version -- there is an error in the Rhys Davids translation at his point.) Uttara complains that the food and clothing he is called upon to distribute are of such poor quality that Payasi would not touch them himself, and Payasi finally gives him leave to supply "food as I eat and clothes as I wear." At the conclusion of the sutta, we are told of the rewards the two men received after death. Payasi, who had established the charity grudgingly, was indeed reborn in a heavenly world, but in the very lowest, that of the Four Great Kings, where he was lodged in the empty Serisaka mansion (//vimana//). Here, indeed, he was visited by the Venerable Gavampati, an Arahant who made a habit of taking his siesta in the lower heavens. And so the story was brought back to earth. But Uttara, who had reorganized the charity and given from the heart, was born in a higher heaven, among the Thirty-three Gods.

Probably few Westerners will give in order to be reborn among the Thirty-three Gods, and perhaps the only reward some people look to is an easing of the conscience: being aware of some particular need -- of which the case of Ethiopia is the outstanding current example -- people feel unable to live with themselves if they do //not// give something. This is certainly better than hoping for a heavenly reward, but an easy conscience, too, may perhaps sometimes be purchased a little too easily. Best let the giving itself be its own reward, and leave it at that!

GENEROSITY: THE INWARD DIMENSION

by
Nina Van Gorkom

As from a heap of flowers many a garland is made, even so many good deeds should be done by one born a mortal.

Dhammapada, 53

The giving away of useful or pleasant things is an act of generosity. However, if we only pay attention to the outward deeds we do not know whether or not we are being sincerely generous. We should learn more about the mind which motivates our deeds. True generosity is difficult. While we are giving, our thoughts may not all be good and noble. Our motives for giving may not all be pure. We may give with selfish motives -- expecting something in return, hoping to be liked by the receiver or our gift, wanting to be known as a generous person. We may notice that there are different thoughts at different moments, some truly generous, and others having different motives.

The Buddha taught that there is no lasting mind or soul which undergoes different experiences. Our experiences themselves are different moments of consciousness, which arise one at a time and then fall away immediately. Each moment of consciousness that arises and falls away is succeeded by the next moment of consciousness. Our life is thus a series of moments of consciousness arising in succession. Gradually we can learn to distinguish different types of consciousness. There is consciousness which is unwholesome or unskillful, and there is consciousness which is wholesome or skillful, and besides these there are other types of consciousness which are neither wholesome nor unwholesome. Only one type of consciousness occurs at a time, but each type is accompanied by several mental factors. Unwholesome types of consciousness are accompanied by unwholesome mental factors, such as attachment, stinginess, jealousy or aversion. Wholesome types of consciousness are accompanied by beautiful mental factors, such as generosity, kindness or compassion.

Three of the unwholesome mental factors are "roots of evil." [*] These are the strong foundation of unwholesome types of consciousness: attachment or greed, aversion or anger, and ignorance.

[*] See Nyanaponika Thera, //The Roots of Good and Evil// (Wheel No. 251/253).

Each of these unwholesome factors has many shades and degrees. We may know that there is attachment when we are greedy for food or desire to acquire someone else's property. However, we may not realize that there is also attachment when we enjoy natural scenery or beautiful music. In society attachment of a subtle kind is considered good, provided we do not harm others. The unwholesome has a wider range than what we call in conventional language "immoral." It can include states that are weaker than the immoral. We cannot force ourselves not to like beautiful things; there are conditions for the arising of attachment. But we can learn to know the difference between the moments which are wholesome and the moments which are unwholesome. A degree of selfishness persists even in moments of subtle attachment. These are different from selfless moments of consciousness accompanied by generosity, when we do not think of our own enjoyment. There is attachment time and again, when we stand up, move around, reach for things, eat or go to sleep. We think of ourselves and want to acquire pleasant things for ourselves. We expect other people to be nice to us, and this is also a form of attachment.

We may wonder whether attachment to relatives is wholesome. Attachment to relatives is not wholesome; it is different from pure loving-kindness, which is wholesome. When we cling to the pleasant feeling we derive from the company of relatives or dear friends, there is attachment. When we are genuinely concerned for someone else we do not think of ourselves, and then there is wholesome consciousness. We are so used to living with attachment that we may have never considered the difference between the moments of attachment and the moments of unselfish love. The different types of consciousness succeed one another so rapidly that so long as we have not developed understanding of them, we do not notice that they have changed.

The unwholesome root of aversion also has many degrees. It can manifest as slight uneasiness or as coarse anger or hate. Aversion does not arise at the time as attachment. When there is attachment consciousness likes the object that is experienced and when there is aversion consciousness dislikes the object. Attachment arises with certain types of consciousness, not with all types, and so does aversion.

Ignorance is an unwholesome root that arises with all types of unwholesome consciousness. It is the root of all evil. Ignorance does not know what is wholesome and what is unwholesome, it does not know anything about what is real. Whenever there is attachment or aversion, at the same time there is also ignorance.

The three beautiful roots are: non-attachment or generosity, non-aversion or kindness, and understanding or wisdom. Each type of wholesome consciousness is rooted in non-attachment and non-aversion, and it may be rooted in understanding as well. Each of these beautiful roots has many degrees. Without the assistance of non-attachment and non-aversion wholesome consciousness could not arise motivating acts of generosity. Attachment cannot exist at the same time as generosity. When one is truly generous one gives impartially and does not restrict one's generosity to people one likes or to the members of one's family. The purpose of all kinds of wholesomeness should be to eliminate defilements, to get rid of selfishness. The Buddha taught the wisdom that can eradicate the clinging to the idea of self, but if one does not learn to get rid of stinginess and clings to one's possessions, one cannot give up the clinging to self.

When we see that true generosity is beneficial and that selfishness and stinginess are harmful, we would like to have more moments of generosity. However, in spite of our wishes, we notice that unwholesome types of consciousness often arise. Then we are disappointed with ourselves. We should acquire understanding of what conditions the arising of unwholesome consciousness. We must have been full of attachment, aversion and ignorance in the past, even in past lives. Such tendencies have become deeply rooted; they have been accumulated. What is past has gone already, but the unwholesome tendencies that have been accumulated can condition the arising of unwholesome consciousness at the present time.

We have accumulated not only tendencies to evil but also inclinations to the wholesome. That is why there can also be moments of generosity and kindness at the present time. When an unwholesome type of consciousness arises we accumulate more unwholesomeness; when a wholesome type arises we accumulate more wholesomeness.

The Buddha taught different ways of developing wholesomeness, and when we learn about these ways there are already conditions for more wholesomeness. We find opportunity for generosity not only while we are giving but also before the actual giving, when we try to obtain the things we intend to give, and afterwards when we recollect our giving. When we are honest with ourselves we can notice that before, during and after the giving, opportunities for generosity are often spoilt by unwholesome consciousness. We may get tired when we have to buy or prepare the gift, and then aversion arises. While we are giving the gift the receiver may be ungrateful and fail to respond to our gift in the way we expected and then we may be disappointed.

However, when we have right understanding of what wholesomeness is, we should be concerned only with developing wholesome states of mind and not with the reactions of other people. Wholesomeness is wholesomeness and nobody else can change the wholesome consciousness that arises. Before we learnt about the Buddha's teachings we did not consider generosity in this way, we did not pay attention to the moments of consciousness. Through the Buddha's teachings we learn about things as they really are. After the act of giving the opportunity to recollect our generosity with wholesome consciousness can be wasted by unwholesome consciousness. At first we may have been generous, but afterwards we may find that the gift was too expensive and regret have spent our money.

The Buddha taught that there is no self that can exert power over the different types of consciousness that arise; they arise because of their appropriate conditions. Through his teachings we can learn about the different types of consciousness and about our accumulated tendencies. Thus there will be more understanding of what is real, and this too is wholesome. When one has accumulated the tendency to stinginess it is difficult to be generous, but through the understanding of what the Buddha taught inclinations can be changed.

We read in the commentary to the Subhabhojana Jataka (Stories of the Buddha's Former Births, Jatakas, Book V, No. 535) about a monk in the Buddha's time who practiced the utmost generosity. He gave away his food, and if he received drink sufficient to fill the hollow of his hand, he would, free from greed, still give it away. But formerly he used to be so stingy that "he would not give so much as a drop of oil on the tip of a blade of grass." In one of his past lives, when he was named Kosiya, he lived as a miser. One day he had a craving for rice porridge. When his wife suggested that she would cook porridge not only for him but also for all the inhabitants of Benares, he felt "just as if he had been struck on the head with a stick." Then his wife offered to cook for a single street, or only for the attendants in his house, only for the family, only for the two of them, but he turned down all her offers. He wanted porridge cooked for himself alone, in the forest, so that nobody else could see it. The Bodhisatta, who was at that time the god Sakka, wanted to convert him and came to him with four attendants disguised as brahmins. One by one they approached the miser and begged for some of his porridge. Sakka spoke the following stanza, praising generosity (387):

> From little one should little give, from moderate means likewise,
> From much give much: of giving nothing no question can arise.
> This then I tell you, Kosiya, give alms of that is thine:
> Eat not alone, no bliss is his that by himself shall dine,
> By charity you may ascend the noble path divine.

Kosiya reluctantly offered them some porridge. Then one of the brahmins changed into a dog. The dog made water and a drop of it fell on Kosiya's hand. Kosiya went to the river to wash and then the dog made water in Kosiya's cooking pot. When Kosiya threatened him he changed into a "blood horse" and pursued Kosiya. Then Sakka and his attendants stood in the air and Sakka preached to Kosiya out of compassion and warned him of an unhappy rebirth. Kosiya came to understand the danger of stinginess. He gave away all his possessions and became an ascetic.

We may find it difficult to part with our possessions, but when we die we cannot take them with us. Life is short: thus when we have an opportunity for generosity we should use it in order to combat selfishness. Each moment of generosity now will condition the arising of generosity in the future.

Good deeds bring about pleasant results and bad deeds bring unpleasant results. This is the law of kamma and its fruit, of cause and effect. [*] A deed (kamma) can produce result in the form of rebirth. Wholesome kamma can produce a happy rebirth and unwholesome kamma can produce an unhappy rebirth. Besides the human plane of existence, there are other planes which are happy or unhappy. Birth in the human plane or in a heavenly plane is a happy rebirth conditioned by wholesome kamma; birth in a hell plane, as a ghost or as an animal is an unhappy rebirth conditioned by unwholesome kamma. Kamma can also produce results in the form of pleasant or unpleasant sense experiences arising in the course of life. Seeing and hearing are types of consciousness that are results of kamma. We see and hear pleasant or unpleasant objects according to the kamma that produces these experiences.

[*] See //Kamma and Its Fruit// (Wheel No. 221/224).

Stinginess can bring about -- either in this life or in a future life -- the very result we fear: loss of possessions. Generosity can bring about pleasant results, such as prosperity. However, when we perform acts of generosity we should not cling to pleasant results; clinging is unwholesome. Kamma will produce its appropriate result whether we think of it or not. While we are giving we can have right understanding of kamma and its result, without clinging. We may do good deeds with the understanding of what wholesomeness is. As we have seen, understanding is a beautiful root which may or may not accompany wholesome consciousness. When understanding accompanies the wholesome consciousness, it increases the degree of wholesomeness. We cannot make understanding arise at will; it arises when there are conditions for it. Learning what the Buddha taught is a condition for greater understanding.

There are still other ways of practicing generosity, even when we do not have things to give. The application of other people's good deeds is also a type of generosity. When we notice that someone else is doing a good deed we can appreciate his wholesomeness, and we may express this with words of approval and praise. We may be stingy not only with regard to our possessions but also with regard to words of praise. Gradually one can learn to be generous in appreciating the wholesomeness of others.

In Thailand I had an opportunity to learn about this way of generosity, which I had not heard of before. I received a book that was printed on the occasion of the birthday of Her Majesty Queen Sirikit of Thailand. This book mentioned many of her good works, such as promoting the teaching of Buddhism, supporting temples, improving the standard of living of the people in the provinces by setting up different projects for them. When one reads this one can sincerely admire and rejoice in the good works of Her Majesty. In Thailand I also often heard the Thais saying, "//anumodana//," which means "thanks," with the inclination of their head and clasped hands. This they do when they respect and appreciate the wholesomeness of others, usually on occasions of presenting food to the monks or giving books on the Buddhist teachings. It can become a wholesome custom to express one's appreciation on such occasions.

When we know about this way of generosity we may remember to speak about others with wholesome consciousness. In the development of wholesomeness one has to be farsighted. One should realize that whatever wholesomeness or unwholesomeness one accumulates today will produce its effects in the future, even in future lives. One can become more adept in evaluating the circumstances one is in and the friends one has. One will then be able to judge whether or not one's surroundings and friends are favorable for the development of wholesomeness. One will know what kind of speech should be avoided, what kind of speech cultivated. Often conversation tends to be about the bad qualities of others or about useless matters which are not helpful for the development of wholesomeness. Since we often become engaged in conversation with others, we should learn how to turn the conversation into an opportunity for wholesomeness.

Another way of generosity is the "sharing" of one's wholesome deeds with others. This does not mean that other people can receive the pleasant results of our good deeds. The Buddha taught that beings are "heirs" to their deeds. We each receive the results of the deeds we have done ourselves. Sharing wholesomeness with others means that our good deeds can be the condition for the arising of wholesome consciousness in others when they rejoice in our good deeds. We can share wholesomeness even with beings in other planes of existence, provided they are in planes where they can receive the benefits.

The commentary to the Without the Walls Sutta [*] narrates that King Bimbisara offered a meal to the Buddha and omitted to dedicate his merits to other beings. Ghosts, his relatives in a former life, had hoped for this in vain, and because they were disappointed, in their despair they made a horrible screeching noise throughout the night. The Buddha explained to King Bimbisara why the ghosts had screeched. Then King Bimbisara made another offering and uttered the dedication, "Let this be for those relatives." The ghosts benefited from his gifts immediately; they had wholesome states of consciousness and their sufferings were allayed. Lotus-covered pools were generated for them in which they could bathe and drink, and they took on the colour of gold. Heavenly food, heavenly clothing and heavenly palaces manifested spontaneously for their use. This story illustrates that one can share one's good deeds with departed ones. If one's departed relatives are not able to receive the merit, other beings can.

[*] In //The Illustrator of Ultimate Meaning (Paramatthajotika)//, Commentary to the Minor Readings (Khuddakapatha). London: Pali Text Society, 1960.

It is understandable that we are sad when we lose loved ones, but if we know how to develop what is wholesome we can find great consolation. Instead of becoming filled with sadness and aversion, we should dedicate our good deeds to all those who are able to rejoice in them, then our consciousness will be wholesome. It can become our custom to share wholesomeness with others; we need not even specify to whom we wish to dedicate it.

It is a Buddhist custom when a meal or robes are offered to monks to pour water over one's hands while the monks recite words of blessings, in order to give expression to one's intention to dedicate this deed to other beings. The water symbolizes a river which fills the ocean, and even so a wholesome deed is so plentiful that it can also be shared with others.

Good deeds are usually classified as threefold: as generosity, morality, and mental development. This threefold classification should not be considered a rigid one. Morality, or abstinence from evil deeds, can also be seen as an aspect of generosity, as an act of kindness to others. When we abstain from evil deeds we give other beings the opportunity to live in peace, free from harm. If we want to develop generosity, we should not neglect mental development -- the development of wholesome states of mind. We should know when consciousness is unwholesome and when wholesome in order to develop generosity and other good qualities. Knowing more about one's different types of consciousness is mental development.

The "stream-winner" is the noble person at the first stage of enlightenment. He has developed right understanding of the different mental and physical phenomena that appear at the present moment and has seen realities as they are. With the attainment of enlightenment he experiences Nibbana, the unconditioned reality, for the first time. At the moment of enlightenment the wrong view of self is eradicated, and with it stinginess too is destroyed. Stinginess can never arise again, and he thus has perfect generosity. An ordinary person may be able to suppress stinginess temporarily, for example, at the time of giving, but stinginess is bound to arise again so long as its accumulated tendency remains. The stream-winner, through right understanding, has eradicated the tendency to stinginess and can never be overcome by it anymore.

Learning from the Buddha's teachings how to develop wholesomeness and to eradicate defilements is the greatest blessing. Therefore the teaching of the Dhamma, the Buddha's teaching, should be considered as the giving of the highest gift. In learning what the Buddha taught and in developing wholesomeness we correct our views about what is worthwhile striving for and what is not, about what is real and what is mere illusion. Before we heard about the Buddha's teachings we may have considered the enjoyment of pleasant sense objects to be the goal of our life. After we learn the Buddha's teachings we may gradually come to see that selfish attachment gives unrest of mind and that it is harmful to ourselves and others. We may come to understand that wholesomeness is beneficial both for ourselves and for others, that it brings peace of mind.

Our outlook on what is worthwhile in life can change. We correct our views about reality when we understand what wholesome kamma is and what unwholesome kamma is, when we understand that kamma brings its appropriate result. We correct our views when we understand that not a self but different types of consciousness, wholesome and unwholesome, motivate our deeds, when we understand that these types of consciousness arise because of different conditioning factors. There are many degrees of correcting one's views. By developing understanding of realities the wrong view of self can be eradicated, and thereby perfect generosity can emerge. The effect of learning the Dhamma should be that we become less selfish and more generous, that we have more genuine concern for other people.

THE PERFECTION OF GIVING

by Acariya Dhammapala

From the //Cariyapitaka Atthakatha//, translated by Bhikkhu Bodhi in //The Discourse on the All-Embracing Net of Views: The Brahmajala Sutta and Its Commentaries// (BPS, 1978), pp. 289-96, pp. 322-23.

The perfection of giving is to be practiced by benefiting beings in many ways -- by relinquishing one's happiness, belongings, body and life to others, by dispelling their fear, and by instructing them in the Dhamma.

Herein, giving is threefold by way of the object to be given: the giving of material things (//amisadana//), the giving of fearlessness (//abhayadana//), and the giving of the Dhamma (//dhammadana//). Among these, the object to be given can be twofold: internal and external. The external gift is tenfold: food, drink, garments, vehicles, garlands, scents, unguents, bedding, dwellings, and lamps. These gifts, again, become manifold by analyzing each into its constituents, e.g., food into hard food, soft food, etc. The external gift can also become sixfold when analyzed by way of sense objects: visible forms, sounds, smells, tastes, tangibles, and non-sensory objects. The sense objects, such as visible forms, become manifold when analyzed into blue, etc. So too, the external gift is manifold by way of the divers valuables and belongings, such as gems, gold, silver, pearls, coral, etc.; fields, land, parks, etc.; slaves, cows, buffaloes, etc.

When the Great Man (the Bodhisatta) gives an external object, he gives whatever is needed to whomever stands in need of it; and knowing by himself that someone is in need of something, he gives it even unasked, much more when asked. He gives sufficiently, not insufficiently, when there is something to be given. He does not give because he expects something in return. And when there is not enough to give sufficiently to all, he distributes evenly whatever can be shared. But he does not give things that issue in affliction for others, such as weapons, poisons, and intoxicants. Nor does he give amusements which are harmful and lead to negligence. And he does not give unsuitable food or drink to a person who is sick, even though he might ask for it, and he does not give what is suitable beyond the proper measure.

Again, when asked, he gives to householders things appropriate for householders, and to monks things appropriate for monks. He gives to his mother and father, kinsmen and relatives, friends and colleagues, children, wife, slaves, and workers, without causing pain to anyone. Having promised an excellent gift, he does not give something mean. He does not give because he desires gain, honor, or fame, or because he expects something in return, or out of expectation of some fruit other than the supreme enlightenment. He does not give detesting the gift or those who ask. He does not give a discarded object as a gift, not even to unrestrained beggars who revile and abuse him. Invariable he gives with care, with a serene mind, full of compassion. He does not give through belief in superstitious omens: but he gives believing in kamma and its fruit.

When he gives he does not afflict those who ask by making them do homage to him, etc.; but he gives without afflicting others. He does not give a gift with the intention of deceiving others or with the intention of injuring; he gives only with an undefiled mind. He does not give a gift with harsh words or a frown, but with words of endearment, congenial speech, and a smile on his face.

Whenever greed for a particular object becomes excessive, due to its high value and beauty, its antiquity, or personal attachment, the Bodhisatta recognizes his greed, quickly dispels it, seeks out some recipients, and gives it away. And if there should be an object of limited value that can be given and a suppliant expecting it, without a second thought he bestirs himself and gives it to him, honoring him as though he were an uncelebrated sage. Asked for his own children, wife, slaves, workers, and servants, the Great Man does not give them while they are as yet unwilling to go, afflicted with grief. But when they are willing and joyful, then he gives them. But if he knows that those who ask for them are demonic beings -- ogres, demons, or goblins -- or men of cruel disposition, then he does not give them away. So too, he will not give his kingdom to those intent on the harm, suffering, and affliction of the world, but he would give it away to righteous men who protect the world with Dhamma.

This, firstly, is the way to practice the giving of external gifts.

The internal gift should be understood in two ways. How? Just as a man, for the sake of food and clothing, surrenders himself to another and enters into servitude and slavery, in the same way the Great Man, wishing for the supreme welfare and happiness of all beings, desiring to fulfill his own perfection of giving, with a spiritually-oriented mind, for the sake of enlightenment, surrenders himself to another and enters into servitude, placing himself at the disposal of others. Whatever limbs or organs of his might be needed by others -- hands, feet, eyes, etc. -- he gives them away to those who need them, without trembling and without cowering. He is no more attached to them, and no more shrinks away (from giving them to others), than if they were external objects. Thus the Great Man relinquishes an internal object in two ways: for the enjoyment of others according to their pleasure; or, while fulfilling the wishes of those who ask, for his own self-mastery. In this matter he is completely generous, and thinks:

"I will attain enlightenment through non-attachment." Thus the giving of the internal gift should be understood.

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

The Dhamma Dana Publication Fund is dedicated to bringing a long-standing Buddhist tradition to America by making high-quality books on Buddhist teachings available for free distribution. We are interested in publishing original works, whether based on critical scholarly interpretation of the canonical teachings, or on the unique perspective that arises from extensive practical meditative experience.

Dhamma Dana Publications depends entirely on voluntary contributions for its work. If you are interested in contributing to the general fund for publications, or if you are interested in sponsoring a particular book for publication, please contact the Study Center. Likewise, if you would like to submit an original manuscript to the editorial committee for review, please let us know.

Through the generosity of authors and sponsors we hope to be able to continue this ancient and potent tradition of transmitting the teachings.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu, "The Mind Like Fire Unbound: An Image in the Early Buddhist Discourses" (November 1993; paper, 125pp)

Early Buddhism borrowed two of its central terms from the workings of fire. //Upadana//, or clinging, originally referred to the fuel that kept fire burning; //nibbana//, the name of the goal, to a fire's going out. This is the first book to examine these terms from the perspective of how the early Buddhists themselves viewed fire -- what they saw happening as a fire burned, and what happened to the fire when it went out -- to show what light this perspective throws on Buddhist doctrine in general, and the practice of meditation in particular.

With extensive quotations from the Pali Canon, newly translated, this is also a useful sourcebook for anyone who wants to encounter Buddhist teachings in their earliest known context.

Thynn, Dr. T., "Living Meditation, Living Insight" (revised edition, first published 1992; due April 1995; paper 120pp)

[From the Foreword by Jack Kornfield]: I am very impressed by the thoroughness and care with which Dr. Thynn Thynn explains the path of mindfulness in daily life in her book. This has not been so much emphasized so strongly in the monastic and meditative teachings of Buddhism that have come to take root in the West. In fact, much of Buddhist practice in Asia has followed the intensive model. But clearly, that will not work for those of us who are householders in the West. And anyway, the wonderful experiences of intensive practice often lead to less transformation of our lives than we might hope; so that after intensive meditation practice we are back again in the midst of our lives with the question of how to bring the Dhamma to bear in everyday life. I am so pleased when I see a book like Dr. Thynn Thynn's that speaks directly to the situation.

I applaud her clarity and courage for teaching in the straightforward way that she does.

Upasika Kee Nanayon (K. Khao-suan-luang), "An Unentangled Knowing: The Teachings of a Thai Buddhist Lay Woman" (Thanissaro Bhikkhu, tr.; due April 1995; paper 120pp)

This book collects between two covers over two-dozen Dhamma talks by the Thai forest meditation master Upasika Kee Nanayon (1901-1978). Translations of some of these talks appeared previously in small collections ("Reading the Mind" and "Looking Inward"), but all have been thoroughly revised for the present edition. Several previously-unpublished talks are also included.

These talks capture the profound and powerful teaching style for which Upasika Kee was widely known and respected, among both lay and monastic practitioners in Asia. This fluent translation now brings these timeless teachings to life for the benefit of English-speaking Dhamma practitioners around the world.

PARAMIS: The Ten Perfections

1. Dana: Generosity
   May I be generous and helpful
2. Sila: Morality
   May I be well-disciplined and refined in manners.
   May I be pure and clean in all my dealings.
   May my thoughts, words and deeds be pure
3. Nekkhama: Renunciation
   May I not be selfish and self-possessive, but selfless and disinterested.
   May I be able to sacrifice my pleasure for the sake of others.
4. Panna: Wisdom
   May I be wise and able to see things as they truly are.
   May I see the light of truth and lead others from darkness to light.
   May I be enlightened and be able to enlighten others.
5. Viriya: Energy
   May I be energetic, vigorous and persevering.
   May I strive diligently until I achieve my goal.
   May I be fearless in facing dangers and courageously surmount all obstacles.
   May I be able to serve others to the best of my ability.
6. Khanti: Patience
   May I ever be patient.
   May I be able to bear and forbear the wrongs of others.
   May I ever be tolerant and see the good and beautiful in all.
7. Sacca: Truthfulness
   May I ever be truthful and honest.

May I not swerve from the path of truth.

8. Adhitthana: Determination

May I be firm and resolute and have an iron will.
May I be soft as a flower and firm as a rock.
May I ever be high-principled.

9. Metta: Loving Kindness

May I ever be kind, friendly and compassionate
May I be able to regard all as my brothers and sisters and be one with all.

10. Upekkha: Equanimity

May I ever be calm, serene, unruffled and peaceful.
May I gain a balanced mind.
May I have perfect equanimity.

May I serve to be perfect.
May I be perfect to serve.

HOW BODHISATTA DEVELOP THE PERFECTIONS

"Bodhisattas' minds maintain their balance by giving preference to other beings' welfare, by dislike of the suffering of others, by desiring that the success of others endure, and by impartiality towards all beings. They give gifts (//Dana//) to all beings (without showing preference). They undertake the precepts of virtue (//Sila//) in order to avoid harming living beings. They perfect their virtue by practising renunciation (//Nekkhamma//). They purify their wisdom (//Panna//) in order to understand clearly what is beneficial and what is harmful to living beings. They constantly arouse energy (//Viriya//), keeping the welfare and happiness of others in mind. When they have acquired heroic fortitude through supreme energy, they become patient (//Khanti//) with the many failings or shortcomings of others. Once they promise to give or do something, they do not break their promise (thus they are truthful, //sacca//). With unshakable resolution (//Aditthana//) they work for the welfare and happiness of others. They place others before themselves through unshakable loving kindness (//Metta//). They do not expect anything in return through equanimity (//Upekkha//)."

Ashin Maha Buddhaghosa,
//The Path of Purification// (Ch.iX, par. 124)

FOREWORD

For those of us who cannot remember our own past lives or see the past lives of others, it is not always possible to appreciate our good fortune in being born as humans during a period when the teachings of a Buddha are available. As Sayagyi U Ba Khin points out in his lectures "What Buddhism Is", the last Buddha had to continue working for four //asankheyyas// (a number of world cycles equal to 1 followed by 140 ciphers) and one hundred thousand //kappas// (world cycles).

We can all appreciate that not just anybody can pick up a tennis racket and walk off with first prize at Wimbledon. But we may not appreciate the preparation that is necessary in order to win first prize in liberation. Concentrating the mind and understanding that conditioned existence is unsatisfactory, changing and uncontrollable is not just a matter of sitting still and closing your eyes. We must work hard on leading moral lives, and we must go into training with the ten perfections (//paramis// or //paramitas//): generosity, morality, renunciation, wisdom, perseverence or effort, forbearance or patience, truthfulness, determination, loving-kindness, and even mindedness or equanimity.

These ten virtues may be obvious and self explanatory. But I think if you are not from a Buddhist background, like me, you will occasionally find in an explanation such as the one we publish here certain aspects you did not expect. The more thoroughly we grasp the idea of these virtues the better we will be able to live them in our lives. And when we come to take the next step, we will find we have been preparing ourselves to control our minds and to attain true happiness. Not that one stops practising virtuous acts once he begins to meditate! Far from it. Each part of the teaching helps others. The more we advance in one, the more we will work on the others.

As Sayagyi said in his introduction to the International Meditation

Centre, Rangoon, "Individual development (in meditation) depends on one's own //Paramita// (perfections) and his capability to fulfill the five Elements of Effort (//Padhaniyanga//), viz. Faith, Health, Sincerity, Energy and Wisdom."

It is our hope that these publications will serve as an inspiration to those practising on the path leading to Nibbana.

Peace to all beings

PREFACE

We are happy to be able to translate, adapt and publish this extract from a modern-day commentary on a Buddhist text which was published in Burmese in 1960. The Zambumeikswe Pitaka Press and Publishing House of Rangoon, Burma, originally published in 1935 a work by the Venerable Sayadaw of Ngarkhon village, popularly known by his Burmese title, Venerable Ngarkhon Sayadaw, who lived during the reign of King Bagyidaw (ruled 1819-1837). The king conferred the title of `Adiccavamsabhidhaja Mahadhammarajadirajaguru' on him for his great learning. His work deals with the efforts leading up to the Enlightenment of the Buddha Gotama. Efforts were made to add more material to this by a learned layman: Aggamaha Pandita Sayagyi U Lin, M.A., and finally, Tipitakadhara Dhammabhandagarika Sayadaw Ashin Vicittasaraghivamsa, Aggamaha Pandita Abhidaja Maha Ratthaguru was responsible for polishing the text and using an up-to-date vocabulary in Burmese. The title is //Mahabuddhavamsa// which we can translate by //The Great Chronicle of Buddhas//. (We refer to it hereafter as `the Burmese Commentary'.)

The Burmese translation has been adapted for Western readers. We have used English translations of the texts quoted from the Pali canon and commentaries whenever available. At times we have felt it was necessary to give more details so the texts would be readily understood by people without previous knowledge of Buddhism. We are entirely responsible for the English version.

The Burmese commentary is based on the //Buddhavamsa// in the Pali canon (translated into English by I.B. Horner, //Chronicle of Buddhas//, Pali Text Society) and the extensive commentary on it by Buddhadatta (translated into English by I.B. Horner, //The Clarifier of the Sweet Meaning//, PTS). These works give the details concerning the efforts to become a Buddha made by Gotama and an account of the twenty-four Buddhas who preceded him.

One of the most important aspects of the preparation to be a Buddha is the accomplishment of the ten perfections. A Bodhisatta (Buddha-to-be) must fulfill the perfections in three degrees:

1. to the degree which suffices for becoming an Arahat (fully-enlightened) and involves the sacrifice of external possessions,

2. to the higher degree which suffices for becoming a chief disciple and involves the sacrifice of one's limbs, and

3. the ultimate degree, leading to Buddhahood and involving the sacrifice of one's life.

The account of the period of preparation for Buddhahood begins when the resolution to become a Buddha is first made and confirmed by a Buddha. In the case of Gotama, this occured when he was a hermit named Sumedha and the prediction was given by the Buddha Dipankara (the twenty-fourth Buddha before Gotama). It is after a Buddha confirms his resolution that a Boddhisatta reflects on what must be done to accomplish this, and he passes in review the ten perfections. At the time he met the Buddha Dipankara, Sumedha had already practised the ten perfections to the degree of becoming an Arahat and the only reason he did not become enlightened was that he wished to become a Buddha himself. So the accounts we have of his practice of the perfections in texts such as the Jataka stories are examples of the higher efforts. It may be useful to bear this in mind if the Bodhisatta's example seems too difficult for us to emulate.

The text on the ten perfections which is translated and adapted here is from an appendix (or //Anu-dipani//, `Further commentary') to the Burmese commentary. This appendix gives supplementary information concerning various aspects of the Bodhisatta's career, but we have included here only the discussion on the ten perfections as a text particularly useful for students of Buddhist meditation.

SOME ASPECTS OF THE TEN PERFECTIONS, FROM "A TREATISE ON THE PARAMIS

The commentary to the "Basket of Conduct" is a detailed essay on the ten perfections. It has been translated by Bhikkhu Bodhi under the title, `A Treatise on the Paramis'. The discussion is organized around a series of questions, similar to the style used in commentaries such as the //Visuddhimagga//. Much of the information in this commentary was included in the discussion on the perfections in the appendix of the Burmese commentary that we have translated here. For a general discussion of all ten perfections taken together, we use here the translation by Bhikkhu Bodhi. More details may be had by consulting the full translation. The "Treatise" primarily considers the perfections as they are developed by a Bodhisatta. We have confined our discussion here to the aspects that would apply to everyone working towards enlightenment.

The perfections are noble qualities which are all accompanied by compassion and skilful means, and are untainted by craving, conceit and wrong views. "Skilful means" (//Upaya-kosalla//) is the wisdom that transforms the ten perfections into requisites of enlightenment. This wisdom and compassion are responsible for the balanced approach that motivates and enables a Bodhisatta to attain Buddhahood. For example: through wisdom he understands the suffering of others, through compassion he strives to alleviate their suffering. Through compassion he enters continued rebirths (//samsara//), through wisdom he does not delight in it. Through wisdom he is free from "I-making" and "my-making", through compassion he is free from lethargy and depression.

Several explanations are given concerning the order of the ten perfections. The order in which they are given follows the order in which the Bodhisatta considers them after making his first vow to become a Buddha.

A general explanation for the ten perfections includes:

1) Generosity (//Dana//), first, because it aids the development of virtue and is easy to practise. It is common to all beings (even ordinary people give) and is the least fruitful.

2) Virtue (//Sila//) purifies both the donor and the recipient. Generosity benefits others and virtue is a complement to that by preventing the affliction of others. Generosity will lead to wealth in future lives. Virtue will lead to favourable states of existence.

3) Renunciation (//Nekkhamma//) is the complement to virtue as virtue means good conduct of body and speech whereas renunciation is good conduct of mind. Renunciation means abandoning the mental obsessions through concentration of the mind (//Jhana//). Concentration succeeds easily when virtue is pure.

4) Wisdom (//Panna//) is next as it is possible once concentration is developed. Renunciation leads to serenity, and wisdom leads to equanimity.

5) Energy (//Viriya//) comes next as wisdom is perfected through the arousing of energy. Energy is the basis for exertion and wisdom the basis of equanimity. Arousing energy is mentioned after the activity of careful consideration, as this approach gives excellent results.

6) Patience (//Khanti//) is a basis for serenity and comes after the basis for exertion, for restlessness due to excessive activity is abandoned through reflective acquiescence in the Dhamma. One who is patient and free from restlessness will persevere in his work.

7) Truthfulness (//Sacca//) is next because the determination to practise patience continues long through truthfulness.

8) Determination (//Adhitthana//) comes next because abstinence from falsehood becomes perfect when determination is unshakeable. Non-deception in speech is complemented by unshakeable commitment to one's word.

9) Loving kindness (//Metta//) is next, for loving kindness perfects the determination to work for the welfare of others and the work which actually provides for others' welfare is stated just after making the determination to do so. This undertaking will be unperturbed only when determination is unshakeable.

10) Equanimity (//Upekkha//) purifies loving kindness. This shows the indifference that must be maintained towards the wrongs inflicted by others when providing for their welfare. This includes developing the quality of remaining impartial even towards those who wish one well.

All the perfections have as their characteristic the benefitting of others. Their function is rendering help to others, or, not vacillating. Their manifestation is the wish for the welfare of others, or, for a bodhisatta, the wish for Buddhahood. Their proximate cause is great compassion, or compassion and skillful means.

They can be defiled by various kinds of wavering thoughts or indecision (//vikappa//). Wavering thoughts about:

1) what to give and whom to give to (generosity),

2) when to act and how to act towards whom (virtue),

3) delight in sensual pleasures and continued existence and discontent if they cease (renunciation),

4) "I" and "mine" (wisdom),

5) being inclined to listlessness and restlessness (energy),

6) oneself and others (patience),

7) claiming to have seen what one has not seen, etc. (truthfulness),

8) the requisites of enlightenment -- finding fault with them and seeing virtue in their opposites (determination),

9) what is harmful and what is beneficial -- being confused about these (loving kindness), and

10) the desirable and the undesirable (equanimity).

The perfections are cleansed when the mind is free from such wavering thoughts. They become pure and luminous when they are not tainted by defilements such as: craving, conceit, views, anger, malice, denigration, domineering, envy, stinginess, craftiness, hypocrisy, obstinacy, presumption, vanity, and negligence.

Their opposites:

1) giving: stinginess,

2) virtue: moral depravity,

3) renunciation: sensual pleasures and the household life,

4) wisdom (knowing things as they really are): ignorance and perplexity,

5) energy: laziness,

6) patience: impatience,

7) truthfulness: deceptive speech,

8) determination: lack of determination,

9) loving kindness: ill will,

10) equanimity: not seeing danger in the vicissitudes of the world.

In general, all the perfections have all the defilements and unwholesome mental states as their opposites. They are all opposed to greed, hatred and delusion in the following ways:

1) giving applies the qualities of non-greed, non-hatred and non-delusion to gifts, recipients and the fruits of giving,

2) virtue removes crookedness and corruption in bodily conduct, etc.,

3) renunciation avoids indulgence in sensual pleasures, the affliction of others and self mortification,

4) wisdom restores sight when one has been blinded by them,

5) energy arouses the true way free from listlessness and restlessness,

6) patience accepts equally the desirable, the undesirable and emptiness,

7) truthfulness proceeds in accordance with the fact whether others give help or inflict harm,

8) determination vanquishes the vicissitudes of the world and remains unshakable in fulfilling the requisites of enlightenment,

9) loving kindness is secluded from the hindrances, and

10) equanimity dispells attraction and repulsion towards desirable and undesirable objects, proceeding evenly under varying circumstances.

Many more details are given concerning the individual perfections and much of this information is included in the discussion of each below. There are also many aspects of the perfections as developed by a Bodhisatta. The high level to which a Bodhisatta fulfills the perfections can serve as an aspiration to all, even if others' ability is less. We have not included all the details for the "Treatise" here, however, as it would make the text too long. The interested reader should consult Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation of the "Treatise".

INTRODUCTION

Sayagyi U Ba Khin taught that when making a gift the donor should bear in mind the impermanence of the receiver, the gift and of himself. This should be done before, during and after the gift is made. The person who has made enough progress in Vipassana meditation can in addition be aware of the occurrence of change (//Anicca//) inside his body as he makes his gift. In Buddhaghosa's commentary on the first book of the Abhidhamma, this is called a gift accompanied by development of the mind or meditation (see //The Expositor//, PTS, p.103 where //Bhavana// is translated by "culture"). In this type of gift we find many accomplishments united. During the act of giving there is absence of greed and this means one is conquering desire (//Lobha//). As this is a virtous act, there is absence of hate (//Dosa//). Through meditation we overcome delusion (//Moha//). In other words, a gift that is given in this way, overcomes the three roots (//Mula//) of unwholesome acts. At the same time we are fulfilling morality (//Sila//), concentration (//Samadhi//) and insight (//Panna//) (see //The Expositor"// p.167).

This is a good illustration of how interconnected the various aspects of the Buddha's teachings are. We cannot just work on one aspect at a time. Each part of the teaching gives support to the other parts. Direct experiencing of impermanence, however, is perhaps one of the most difficult things for us to do. If we have not already prepared through generosity and progress in concentration, we will not be able to feel the rapid changes taking place within us. But even if this should be the case, we can still have an intellectual appreciation that nothing we know in the world is permanent, lasting, eternal.

The present commentary shows us that even the most imperfect of gifts will result in some benefits for us. If we study the various categories given here, it is soon obvious that the single most important factor is what goes on in the mind of the giver, before, during and after making the gift. If we have no control over our minds, we will not choose proper gifts, the best recipient for our gift; we will be unable to prepare the gifts properly or to present them properly. And we may be foolish enough to regret having made the gift afterwards.

No matter what level we are on, the best thing for each of us to do is to be sure we are working for the right goal and that we are making best use of every opportunity we have for progressing towards that goal. When the Venerable Webu Sayadaw asked Sayagyi U Ba Khin what his goal was, Sayagyi answered, "Nibbanic peace within". Then Webu sayadaw asked what he was doing to attain that goal and Sayagyi answered, "I am experiencing //Anicca// inside myself at this moment".

For those of us who are laymen and who are practising the development of our minds, Sayagyi U Ba Khin is an example to inspire us all. In his own words, "Our goal: Nibbanic Peace Within for All!"

PREFACE TO THE PERFECTION OF GENEROSITY (//DANA PARAMI//)

It is instructive to compare the Buddhist approach to generosity with the Western attitude. Many Westerners are surprised to find that it is considered best to give a person who is highly developed in the practise of the Buddha's teachings rather than give priority to charity to the poor and unfortunate. The text given here gives us enough explanations to help us understand why this is so.

We are caught up in the cycle of birth-life-death repeated over and over. Our deeds in past lives determine where we are born in a present life, the circumstances we find ourselves in and what happens to us. The act of giving is accompanied by a certain mental attitude. This mental attitude is the most important of the acts we do, for it determines the rest. The more highly developed the person is to whom we give, the better our mental attitude.

But we should not fall into the error of seeing this as a conscious decision we must make. In Buddhism, all acts of generosity, no matter how imperfect, are considered positive acts. The Buddha said, "If one should throw away pot scourings or the rinsings of cups into a pool or cesspit, with the idea of feeding the creatures that live therin, I declare it would be a source of merit to him: to say nothing of his feeding beings that are human." A person working to become a Buddha must be careful to give with spontaneity, without choosing between recipients. And this is the attitude we find in Buddhist countries. Like a Burmese friend who woke up one morning saying he'd just been dreaming that he had taken a poor beggar for a meal. They practise generosity even in their sleep!

Another point we may find useful is that making a gift to someone we dislike is one of the ways to overcome our hatred. There will be some love present while a gift is made. Love and hate cannot be present in the mind both at the same time. So, for a moment, our hatred will be overcome. And there's often the side-effect that the person will be better disposed towards us afterwards.

We should also learn how to receive gifts. If everyone turned down gifts, no one would be able to make merit. But we often find it easier to give than to receive. Perhaps we are too prone to try and guess the ulterior motives behind the gifts. This is not to say that these should never be taken into consideration, of course. As a high public official, Sayagyi U Ba Khin was careful not to accept contributions to the International Meditation Centre from persons who were hoping to obtain favours from him in his official capacity. But anyone whose motive was correct could contribute.

May this text serve to help us better understand the place of generosity in the Buddha's teachings and be an inspiration to us in working to cut through the vicious circle of continued birth and death.

THE PERFECTION OF GENEROSITY
(//DANA PARAMI//)

The Importance of Generosity

In the "Chronicle of Buddhas" (//Buddhavamsa//) the Bodhisatta Sumedha admonished himself to practise generosity (//Dana//) as the first perfection, just as Bodhisattas of the past had done. So we see that giving or generosity has a very important place among the ten perfections. In the canon, however, we find the Buddha teaching as follows:

> When a wise man, established well in Virtue, > Develops Consciousness and Understanding,
> Then as a bhikkhu ardent and sagacious
> He succeeds in disentangling this tangle.

He only mentions the three trainings: morality (//Sila//), concentration (//Samadhi//) and wisdom (//Panna//). Buddhagosa in his commentary on this text in //The Path of Purification// makes no mention of generosity (//Dana//). In the Eightfold Noble Path, too, there is no path including generosity. The paths only include morality, concentration, wisdom. Therefore some people pretend that generosity is not part of the Buddha's teachings. As it does not lead directly to Liberation, and as it is only the means for living more life cycles, we should not cultivate generosity. One well-known Burmese minister, U Hlaing from Yaw, wrote that the Buddha taught generosity for the sake of ordinary people such as the rich man's son Sunaga.

Many Buddhists are impatient with such views, but impatience is not helpful. It is important to understand what the Buddha taught. The discourse of the Buddha mentioned above is meant for those who are ready to reach the stage of full enlightenment (Arahatship) in the present life. They will not be born again. Generosity is an act which leads to new life, new pleasures. As the Arahat is in his last life, he has no need to develop in generosity. That is why the Buddha mentions only morality, concentration and wisdom and does not mention generosity for these people.

For someone who is not ready to become an Arahat in this life, generosity has the quality of making the mind more pliable. When someone is being generous, his mind is already more pliable, enabling him to observe morality, to concentrate and to develop insight. Many Buddhists have experienced for themselves the shyness that results when they visit a monastery without an offering. That is why the noble disciples like the layman Visaka (the husband of Dhammadinna) always brought an offering when they went to visit the Buddha: sweets and the like in the morning or beverages and medicines in the evening.

Everyone who does not become an Arahat in this life will go through more life cycles. If they do not practise generosity now, it will be difficult to be born in favourable conditions. And even if they obtain a good rebirth, they will not have enough possessions to do meritorious deeds. We cannot beg the question by saying in such a case we would cultivate morality, concentration and wisdom. It is only as a result of past generosity that one can cultivate these three trainings. So it is important for those who are faced with future lives to cultivate generosity.

Bodhisattas are the most important individuals among those who will continue with future life cycles. After having received a sure prediction from a Buddha, they must continue to work for omniscience (//Sabbannuta//) for four //asankheyyas// (a number of years equal to 1 followed by 140 ciphers) and a hundred thousand world cycles. The perfection of generosity is of primary importance for them. Therefore, those who have not yet fulfilled their perfections should not say that generosity is not necessary, simply because there are statements in the canon addressed to those who are ready to become Arahats.

Some people ask if it is possible to reach Nibbana by practising only generosity. Liberation cannot be attained by only practising generosity nor by practising only morality, or even through exclusively practising meditation. Meditating without morality will not give lasting results as that would mean the meditator would be indulging in evil acts. His efforts to meditate would be like a seed turned to ashes because it was put on a burning iron.

Gifts to the Sangha

Seven kinds of gifts to the Sangha (the Community of Bhikkhus) and fourteen kinds for ordinary beings are mentioned in the //Dakkhinavibhanga Sutta// (//The Middle Length Sayings//, III). In regards to ordinary beings it is pointed out that the merit gained increases depending on the receiver, going from animals to the most noble people. Giving to the Sangha is even more meritorious. In the passage on generosity in the //Chronicle of Buddhas//, it is clearly stated that a Bodhisatta should give alms irrespective of the receiver's status.

An illustration of the greater merit acquired in giving to the Sangha is found in the Stories of the Departed (//Minor Anthologies//, IV, PTS). When the Buddha taught the Abhidhamma in the Tavatimsa abode (the second of the deva worlds), two devas came to listen, named Ankura and Indaka. Whenever more powerful devas came, Ankura had to move back out of their way, and finally wound up a great distance away from the Buddha. Indaka, however, did not have to move. Ankura had taken rebirth as a deva because of the merit he made in being extraordinarily generous to ordinary human beings over a period of many years during a human life in which he was very rich. Indaka became a deva because he had given a spoonful of rice to the Arahat Anuruddha. This gift meant that he was the equal of the more powerful devas that Ankura had to make way for. That is why it is said in the canon, //Viceyya danam databbam, yattha dinnam mahapphalam//. ("A gift is to be given having determined who as the receiver will mean great merit.")

The seeming contradiction between giving irrespective of the receiver's status and giving after having chosen the receiver who will procure us the most merit is resolved if we take the above passages in context. The passage in the //Chronicle of Buddhas// discusses the perfections as they are to be developed by Bodhisattas. Bodhisattas work for the attainment of Buddha-Wisdom, omniscience (//Sabbannuta//), and this wisdom is not subdivided by degrees into lesser wisdom, medium wisdom, noble wisdom. In order to attain this unique wisdom, they must develop perfections such as generosity as fully as possible. Ordinary people or devas give gifts in order to obtain various worldly pleasures, so it is normal that they should want their gift to result in the greatest benefit. Therefore they consider who would be the best recipient of their donation.

Types of gifts

The main thing to remember concerning the word //Danaparami// (the perfection of generosity) is that anything which is given away is //Dana// (generosity, charity). There are two kinds of giving: 1. meritorious giving (//Punnavisayadana//) and 2. worldly giving (//Lokavisayadana//). Gifts given out of pure faith and right intentions are meritorious giving. They are part of the perfection of generosity. But gifts given in a love affair, or out of anger, fear, foolishness, etc., or by way of punishment, these are wordly giving; they do not come under the perfection of generosity.

//Dana// (generosity) and //Pariccaga// (abandonment)

In the //Mahahamsa Jataka// (no. 534) the following virtues are listed: generosity, morality, renunciation, uprightness, mildness, self-control, conciliation, mercy, patience, gentleness. These are the ten duties of a king and we can see that //dana// (generosity) and //pariccaga// (renunciation, abandonment; also translated as charity) are mentioned separately.

There are ten things to be given: food, drink, clothing, transportation, flowers, perfumed unguent or powder, ointment, bed, dwelling-place, light (//anna, pana, vattha, yana, mala, gandha, vilepana, seyya, avasatha, padipeyya//). The sub-commentary of the //Mahahamsa Jataka// points out that "//Dana// is giving suitable things in order to enjoy good results in future lives; //Pariccaga// is giving rewards etc. to servants etc. in order to benefit in the present life." The intention or volition accompanying the gift is what makes it //Dana//.

Akitti's Generosity

Another illustration of the difference between generosity and abandonment can be found in the //Akitti Jataka// (no.480). The Bodhisatta was once a brahman by the name of Akitti. After the death of his parents he observed that they had accumulated wealth, but could not take it with them when they died. He determined to accumulate the kind of wealth one can take along after death (i.e., good deeds). So he asked permission of the king and had a drum beaten around the town and a great donation proclaimed. For seven days he gave away his wealth, but there still remained more. Anxious to renounce the world he decided there was no point in taking pleasure in the ceremony of the gifts. So he renounced worldly life and went away leaving the doors open to his house for all who wished to take to come and take. In the example, the seven days during which the Bodhisatta distributes his wealth is an example of generosity (//Dana//) and the abandoning of the rest at the end is an example of abandonment (//Pariccaga//). The reason is that four conditions must be fulfilled for there to be //Dana//: 1. a donor, 2. suitable things to be given, 3. a recipient, 4. the volition to give. Akitti's distribution of wealth during the seven days fulfills all these conditions, whereas he renounced the world before the recipients came to collect the gifts after that, so the second case is abandonment.

It is also possible to differentiate as follows: giving to noble persons (i.e., stream enterer or higher) is //Dana//, whereas giving to those who are ordinary humans (or lower, as in the case of animals) is //Pariccaga//. This would be the sort of distinction implied in the text of the //Mahahamsa Jataka// speaking of the ten duties of a king. Alms given to monks, noble brahmans, etc. would be generosity (//Dana//); gifts to beggars would be abandonment (//Pariccaga//).

Although //Dana// and //Pariccaga// can be differentiated in this way, their basic nature is the same. For giving suitable gifts to recipients is generosity (//Dana//) whether they are near or far. If one bears in mind that property is not owned, then that is abandoning (//Pariccaga//). Abandoning is included in generosity. Before one can give, one must consider, "I will not use that gift any longer." In the //Chronicle of Buddhas// only the perfection of generosity (//Dana//) is mentioned, not abandoning (//caga//, abandoning or liberality; cf. //pariccaga//). As this text describes things according to the truth (//Dhamma//), we can conclude that giving a suitable gift to any recipient, irrespective of status, is generosity (//Dana//). Therefore, we do not need to distinguish between whether a gift goes to a noble person or not.

Similarly, we should remember that generosity (//Dana//) is included in liberality (//caga//) which is included in the seven riches of a noble or moral person (mentioned in the //Anguttara Nikaya//).

The Greatest Abandonings (//Maha-paricaga//) as Generosity

In the commentaries five gifts are mentioned as the greatest abandonings: giving one's limbs, one's eyes, wealth, kingdom, wife and children (//anga, nayana, dhana, rajja, puttadara//). The terms used for these five gifts vary according to the commentator. Giving one's body or life (//atta//) is found instead of wealth. The sub-commentary to //The Path of Purification// substitutes abandoning one's body or life for one's limbs. The commentary to //The Chronicle of Buddhas// substitutes life (//jivita//) for eyes. The commentary to the //Vessantara Jataka// (no. 547) gives: limbs, life, wealth, kingdom, children (//putta//) and wife (//bhariya//), separating the last item into two. The same list is found in the sub-commentary to the //Jinalankara//. But the essentials are the same in these lists: material things apart from one's body (wealth, kingdom, wife and children) and one's body (limbs, eyes, life). Giving one's eyes means running the risk of losing one's life, so these can be considered one and the same, making five gifts.

The Brief Definition of Generosity (Dana)

The essential elements that must be present are the volition to give and suitable things to be given. Without the volition to give there can be no generosity. The volition is present at the time of the donation. It is called relinquishing volition (//munca cetana//), and it is the main element involved in generosity. Anticipating volition (//pubba cetana//) is the desire to give which exists before one makes the donation. If the thing to be given is at hand, this can be called generosity. If the volition to give exists without the object to be given being in the donor's possession it is merely a sentiment of benevolence.

Some people ask why things to be given are called //Dana//, for only mental volition (//cetana//) determines acts which bring future results. This is true: no results can be associated with things; but, as they are a joint cause for generosity, we must say they have the power to yield results. For example, we say that rice is properly cooked because of the fuel we use. Actually, it is the fire that cooks the rice. But the fire cannot appear if there is no fuel. So it is not incorrect for us to say, "The rice is properly cooked because the fuel is good." Likewise, we can say, "One obtains beneficial results because of things given."

In the texts of the canon there are lists of things to be given in //Dana//. In the Vinaya, four things are mentioned: food, robes, monasteries and medicine. Some people take this list to be exclusive. But it should rather be seen as the requisites that the Buddha allowed the Sangha. In the Abhidhamma, gifts are listed as of six sorts, corresponding to the six senses: visible, making sounds, odiferous, with taste, objects of touch, and mental objects. This list too is not a list to limit the types of //Dana// but rather a way to analyse them. In the Suttas, some people maintain, there are ten kinds of //Dana//, the ten cited above from the //Mahahamsa Jataka//. But here again we should take this as a list of ten possible gifts, not a list of the only gifts to be given.

We should keep in mind that the most important element that must be present for there to be //Dana// is volition (//cetana//) to give.

Analysis according to the Abhidhamma method

For a thorough analysis of generosity we should give its characteristic mark (//lakkhana//), function and propery (//kicca//- and //sampatti-rasa//), reappearance as phenomenon and effect (//upatthanakara//- and //phala-paccupatthana//), and proximate cause (//padatthana//).

//Dana// has the characteristic mark of abandoning. Its function and property is to destroy attachment to the things to be given, or to be in possession of guiltlessness. Its effect is a sense of freedom from attachment or knowing that it leads to future existence (//bhava//) and wealth (//bhoga//). This last point means that when we think about the effects of generosity we sense that giving will result in being a human being, deva, etc. in future lives, with great wealth. The proximate cause for giving is things to be given. Without something to be given there can be no gift -- only imagining that one gives: so things to be given are the proximate cause for //Dana//.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY PAIRS (22 groups)

1) Material gifts (//Amisa dana//) and the gift of the teaching (//Dhamma dana//).

Material gifts include giving cooked rice, etc. This includes also giving the requisites (//paccaya//) to monks. Disseminating the teachings of the Buddha (//Dhamma//) through talks, etc. is the gift of the teaching. The Buddha said that this was the noblest of all gifts. This is the division of types of gifts according to the things given.

Some people question whether establishing a pagoda and giving statues of the Buddha can be called //Dana//. They maintain that for the gift to be complete there must be a receiver. They say that these objects should be considered from the point of view of recollection of the qualities of the Buddha, that these objects help by reminding us of these qualities. Others say these objects should be considered as honouring (//apacayana//) the Buddha, etc. They would include these acts under morality (//sila//) as right action (//Caritta//). Recollection of the qualities of the Buddha, honouring the Buddha and observing the moral precepts do not involve giving, however. A person who establishes a pagoda or who installs a statue must spend a large sum of money. Therefore, these acts come under //Dana//.

The question of who receives the gift still remains. Those who use the pagodas and who pay respect to the statues as representatives of the Buddha, both devas and human beings, are the recipients. If we dug wells and ponds to be used by the general public for drinking water, washing, etc., we would not question whether such an act was //Dana//. So even though the giver may not have a particular person in mind whem he makes a gift, but means for it to serve the general public, there is still a recipient and the action is one of //Dana//.

Pagodas and statues are worthy gifts to give for they are sacred, appropriate for keeping relics of the Buddha, just as the cupboards and shelves in a monastery are meant to hold the canonical texts.

Another issue that may be mentioned in passing is the practice of slowly pouring out water when a gift is made. This is a traditional ceremony which comes from India. It is important for those who have a high regard for the ceremony, but for those who do not attach importance to this practice, there is no reproach. The ceremony is entirely optional.

A person who is unable or incapable of teaching the Dhamma can make a gift of the teachings by donating books on the Dhamma. It is like someone who cannot prepare and administer a medicine for a sick person, but who can show the method for preparing the remedy.

This pair of gifts can also be called "honouring with material gifts" (//Amisa puja//) and "honouring with the teaching" (//Dhamma puja//); the terms mean the same thing. The word //puja// is often used when a younger person or less noble person gives to an older person or a person who is more noble (i.e., more advanced in liberation). This can be called "honouring with a gift" (//Puja dana//) and a gift by the older or more noble to the younger or less noble is called "a gift out of kindness" (//Anuggaha dana//). This is not a true division of generosity into two aspects, but rather a division based on general usage.

2) Gifts of one's own person (//Ajjhattika//) and gifts of externals or property (//Bahira//).

Gifts of one's own person include giving life and limbs. Some question whether such gifts are moral if given by ordinary persons. They maintain that such gifts can only be made by a Bodhisatta. We can see that this is not so if we consider how an individual becomes a Bodhisatta. One can only gradually become a Bodhisatta through fulfilling the perfections to the best of one's ability. Therefore, we should not censor a person who through great motivation and faith bravely makes a gift of his own person.

3) Gifts of property (//Vatthu//) and the gift of safety (//Abhaya//).

The first term refers to material things. The second term refers to acts of mercy towards a person, either granting him life or property. This generally comes from kings or governments.

4) Gifts for future lives (//Vattanissita//) and gifts for liberation (//Vivattanissita//).

The first term is for gifts given in hopes of future worldly or heavenly pleasures. The second term is for gifts given in hope of Nibbana.

5) Tainted gifts (//Savajja//) and untainted gifts (//Anavajja//).

An example of a tainted gift would be giving meat after having killed an animal. The gift directly involves an immoral act. We can see the mixed results of such gifts in the case of some fishermen. Because they were generous with what they obtained immorally in past lives, as long as they have improper livelihood (fishing) they were very successful and accumulate wealth. If they decide to change their livelihood, they loose their wealth. Untainted gifts, of course, are those given without any immoral act being involved.

6) Gifts given with one's own hand (//Sahatthika//) and gifts given through a command (//Anattika//).

The first is self-explanatory. The second includes gifts that one asks someone else to make, all gifts made through another person. Gifts given with one's own hand are more potent than gifts given through a command (see the //Payasi Sutta//, "Dialogues of the Buddha",II,p.374).

7) Carefully prepared gifts (//Sakkacca//) and carelessly prepared gifts (//Asakkacca//).

An illustration of these two ways of classifying gifts would be presenting flowers of a tree. If one thinks that the flowers is sufficient in itself, then it is careless generosity. If one makes the effort to arrange the flowers and to present them as attractively as possible, then it is carefully prepared generosity. The comments of some scholars of old have been translated as saying these mean gifts made "after paying due respect" or "without due respect". Some people misunderstand these remarks, thinking they mean that one should pay respects to the person receiving the gift; but here, "paying due respect" means "preparing the gift well".

8) A gift that is accompanied by wisdom (//nana-sampayutta//) and a gift unaccompanied by wisdom (//nanavippayutta//).

If one makes a donation while one is aware of volitional acts (//kamma//) and their results, etc., then it is a gift accompanied by wisdom. If a gift is made because one is imitating others then it is unaccompanied by wisdom. In its most developed form, this would be a gift given while the receiver develops insight: "I am impermanent; the receiver and the gift are impermanent." But knowing that there is cause and effect is sufficient for the gift to be accompanied by wisdom.

9) Spontaneous gifts (//Sasankharika//) and unspontaneous gifts (//Asankharika//).

Donating after being urged or prompted is unspontaneous giving. Giving without being urged is spontaneous giving. This does not mean that if someone asks for something and the person asked gives that that person has given an unspontaneous gift. It is only when a request has to be repeated because the person is reluctant to give that the element of urging comes in. If the person gives as soon as the request is made, then it is a spontaneous gift.

10) Joyful gift (//Somanassa//) and equanimous gift (//Upekkha//).

A joyful gift is one made by a person in a happy mood. An equanimous gift is made by a person whose mind is equanimous.

11) A gift made in accordance with Dhamma (//Dhammiya//) and a gift made not in accordance with the Dhamma (//Adhammiya//).

Giving property that has been justly earned is giving in accordance with the teachings (//Dhamma//). Giving property obtained by immoral means, such as stealing, is giving not in accordance with the teachings. The second type of giving is a moral deed, but the good results of such gifts are not as great as those of the first type. The results can be compared to the types of plants that will grow up from a good seed and from a bad seed.

12) Enslaving gifts (//Dasa//) and liberating gifts (//Bhujissa//).
Donating with a desire for worldly pleasures is the giving that enslaves. The donator is the slave of his master (the craving for worldly pleasures). Gifts made with the desire for the peaceful bliss of Nibbana are revolutionary gifts for the donor is rebelling against the master, craving.

From the beginning of our life-cycles we crave sensual pleasures. We are slaves to this craving and work continuously to satisfy it. Not content with pleasures in our present life, we make gifts in anticipation of living luxuriously in future lives. These are enslaving gifts. Before we encounter the Buddha-Dhamma, these gifts are considered to be the best. But once we are fortunate enough to hear the teachings of the Buddha we understand how powerful craving is, how difficult it is to soothe our craving and how much we must suffer because of this craving. As a result we make gifts with the prospect of attaining Nibbana. These are liberating gifts.

13) Immovable gifts (//Thavara//) and portable gifts (//Athavara//).

Immovable gifts include establishing pagodas, monasteries, rest houses, wells, ponds, etc. Portable gifts are things to be used for a short period of time, such as food, robes, etc.

14) Gifts accompanied by other gifts (//Saparivara//) and unaccompanied gifts (//Aparivara//).

For example, one makes a gift of robes to a monk accompanying the gift with other things. This is the sort of gift that results in special signs on the body for Bodhisattas. If one gives only the intended item, it is an Unaccompanied gift.

15) Established gifts (//Nibaddha//) and occasional gifts (//Anibaddha//).

Established gifts are ones that are given on a daily basis or at regular intervals, such as food, etc. Occasional gifts are those given only when one is able to.

16) Tainted gifts (//Paramattha//) and untainted gifts (//Apparamattha//).

Gifts which are affected by craving and wrong view are tainted gifts. Untainted gifts are not affected by these. According to the Abhidhamma method, wrong thoughts are an aspect of wrong view alone. But wrong view is always connected with craving, so both are mentioned. When the giver looses sight of the goal of Nibbana, due to craving and wrong view, then the gift is tainted. In such cases the donor may wish to become king of the second deva abode, etc. Such wishes are not effective ways of attaining perfect peace. //Dana// can be made during periods when the teachings of a Buddha do not exist. Gifts made during such times will always be tainted gifts. Untainted gifts can only be made during a period when a Buddha's teachings are alive. Therefore, we should strive to make untainted gifts while we have the opportunity.

17) The gift of leftovers (//Ucchittha//) and untouched gifts (//anucchittha//).

If one donates food taken from food that has been prepared for immediate consumption, that is called "the highest gift" (//Agga dana//); and, as it is not left over, it is an untouched gift. If we make a gift of food taken from the meal we are still eating, that is also considered an untouched gift (literally: non-leftover), a noble gift. It is only if we give the food left after we have finished eating that it is a gift of leftovers.
This does not refer to a modest gift given by someone who cannot afford a more expensive gift. But if the donor can afford better things than those he gives, then they are gifts of leftovers.

18) Gifts given while still alive (//Sajiva//) and gifts made after one's death (//Accaya//).

A monk cannot leave gifts to others after his death. Even if he should do so, it would not be a true act of //Dana//. A monk can give from his own property during his lifetime. Or, someone can take from a monk's possession as a token of intimacy (//Vissasagaha//). Or, if a monk owns something jointly with someone else, his partner can receive it after the monk dies. Otherwise, the monk's property becomes the property of the Order after his death. Therefore, only laymen can designate gifts to be made after their death.

19) Gifts to individuals (//Puggalika//) and gifts to the Sangha (//Sanghika//).

Gifts intended for one person, two people, etc. are gifts for individuals. Gifts for the Order of monks or Order of nuns (including all noble persons -- enlightened persons -- who are disciples of the Buddha) are gifts to the Sangha. While the second type of gift is being made, the donor should be clear that the sum total of those in the Sangha are the object of the gift. In the //Dakkhina-vibhanga Sutta// ("Middla Length Sayings", I p. 302) there are 14 kinds of gifts to individuals mentioned and 7 kinds of gifts to the Sangha.

Gifts to individuals (14 kinds)

The 14 kinds of gifts to individuals, in descending order of merit, are gifts made to 1) a Teaching Buddha, 2) a Non-teaching Buddha, 3) one who has attained the fruition state of Arahantship, 4) one who has attained the path of Arahantship, 5) one who has attained the fruition state of Non-returner, 6) one who has attained the path of Non-returner, 7) one who has attained the fruition state of Once-returner, 8) one who has attained the path of Once-returner, 9) one who has attained the fruition state of Stream-enterer, 10) one who has attained the path of Stream-enterer, 11) one who is not attached to sense-pleasures (i.e., who has attained the absorption states), 12) an ordinary individual who is moral, 13) an ordinary individual who is of poor moral habits, 14) an animal.

5 Good Results of Giving Food

There are five good results of feeding animals: long life, good looks, well-being, strength and intelligence. These good results occur for about one hundred lives for the donor. Giving a meal to an immoral layman gives these results for a thousand lives; to a moral layman during a period when a Buddha's teachings are not prevalent gives these results for a hundred thousand lives; to ascetics during these same periods, for ten billion lives; to moral people when a Buddha's teachings are prevalent (i.e., the moral laymen pays respects to the Triple Gem and to //Ariyas// (enlightened people)), for an //asankheyya// (one followed by 140 ciphers) of lives; and, to noble (enlightened) persons up to the Buddha, for //asankheyya// upon //asankheyya// of lives. The Commentary says that by those who pay respects to the Triple Gem are meant those who are trying to reach the first path of Stream-winner.

There is no mention in this list of fourteen types of individuals who are immoral monks. Gifts to such individuals are only mentioned during periods when a Buddha's teaching is not available. So there is a tendency to view such gifts as tainted. But we should remember that someone who becomes a Buddhist at the very last pays respects to the Triple Gem and therefore is trying to reach the first path of Stream-winner. And, if giving things to immoral people during the period, when there is no Buddha-Dhamma leads to good results, then there can be no doubt that giving to such people when the Buddha-Dhamma is alive will yield good results. Ten qualities are said to belong to an immoral monk according to the "Questions of King Milinda". These include respect for the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha, etc. So, it would not be accurate to say that gifts given to immoral monks are given in vain or that it constitutes wrong doing from the point of view of the donor.

Another point of view is that when the Buddha's teachings are not available, people cannot try to follow them, but since they can strive to follow them when they are around, it is wrong to give gifts to those who choose not to do so. This attitude is wrong also. For the Buddha said to Ananda, after listing the 7 kinds of gifts to the Sangha: "There will be in the future monks who are only monks in name, who will tie a strip of cloth around their necks. People will make gifts to them with the intention of giving to the true Sangha which is morally pure. Even this type of gift to the Sangha will give innumerable good results."

4 Purities for Generosity

The first of the four purities for generosity is: a gift is pure if the donor is moral, even if the recipient turns out to be immoral. On the other hand, if we should give to an immoral person in order to support his bad practices -- that is to say, if we give with bad intentions -- then we are at fault. This is why it is important to be mindful, giving with thoughts such as, "It is good to give to someone who has come to my door," etc. When there is right intention, the gift is blameless.

7 Types of Gifts to the Sangha

There are seven types of Gifts to the Sangha: gifts made to 1) the Order of monks (//Bhikkhus//) and nuns (//Bhikkhunis//) during the Buddha's lifetime or 2) after his demise; 3) the Order of monks only; 4) the Order of nuns only; 5) a group of monks and nuns (because one could not afford to give to all monks and nuns); 6) a group of monks (because one could not afford to give to all -- but with the intention of giving to all monks); 7) a group of nuns (for the same reason and with the same intention).

The appropriate way to make a gift to the Order of monks and nuns led by the Buddha after his demise is to present them with a statue containing relics and say, during the ceremony for the gift, "I donate this to both Orders led by the Buddha." As for gifts to be given to the Buddha after his death, they should be given to a monk who is dedicated to the Buddha or to the Sangha; for just as the parents' property goes to the children after the parents die, so too should gifts for the Buddha go to monks and to the Sangha after the demise of the Buddha.

During the Buddha's lifetime, people were generally less attached to personalities and so most gifts were to the Sangha as a whole. So, at that time, the monks generally used the requisites distributed by the Order. And that meant the monks were less inclined to pride, thinking, "This layman gave this monastery to me."

The example of Ugga

Those who wish to make gifts to the Sangha should emulate the rich man Ugga (his story is found in the second sutta of the //Gahapati Vagga// of the //Atthaka Nipata//, "The Book of Gradual Sayings" IV, pp 142 ff).

The Buddha mentioned to the monks that Ugga was possessed of eight special and wonderful qualities, but did not specify what they were. One monk went to Ugga to ask him. Ugga replied that he was not sure exactly which qualities the Buddha meant, but that he would explain what he himself had observed. He then explained that 1) when he first saw the Buddha he had been drinking but as soon as he saw the Buddha he became sober and faith arose in him. 2) The Buddha taught him the Four Noble Truths and he became a Stream-winner and established himself in the five precepts with total abstinence from sexual intercourse (//Brahmacariya-panca-sila//). 3) He told his four wives of his new way of life and offered to find a husband for any of them wishing to remarry. The eldest wife told him of a man she wished to marry and he arranged it without any feelings of jealousy. 4) He shared his wealth with people leading moral lives. 5) He always approached monks with respect; listened to monks with respect; or, if they did not give a discourse, made a discourse himself. 6) Even though devas told him which monks were enlightened, which ones were moral and which ones were immoral, Ugga made no distinction when giving alms. 7) When devas told him the doctrine was well-taught by the Buddha he could reply that he knew this, not because they told him, but because he himself knew this to be true; and in all this, Ugga said that he did not feel pride because devas talked with him. 8) Finally, Ugga said that he was a Non-returner (//Anagami//).

The sixth quality -- giving to the monks without distinguishing between enlightened, moral and immoral monks -- should be understood as follows: when Ugga gave to the monks, he kept in mind the Community of Noble Disciples (//Ariyasangha//) as the object of his donation when the recipient was an Arahat, and he kept in mind the Order of monks (//Bhikkhusangha//) when the recipient was an immoral monk. Thus, he could give without discriminating. Laymen should firmly keep in mind the Order of monks as a whole, driving away any attachment to individuals. In this way their gifts will be generosity to the Sangha, like Ugga's. This, however, is not always easy. Take the example of a layman who decides to make a gift to the Sangha and asks for a representative of the Order of monks to be sent. If a novice is sent, the layman will be disappointed. If a monk of long-standing is sent, the layman will be proud and feel partiality. In such cases, the gift is not perfect generosity to the Sangha. Someone who makes a gift without concerning himself about whether the recipient is a novice, an important monk, a young monk, a wise monk or an ignorant monk, this person can make a true gift to the Sangha.

Gifts to Individual Monks representing the Sangha

There is another example of a layman who had given a monastery and who wished to make a gift to the Sangha. After preparing everything, he went to the Order of monks and asked for them to send a representative. The Order designated a monk who chanced to be an immoral monk. Even though the layman knew the monk to be immoral, still he respectfully made his gift with as much attention as he would give to the Buddha. That afternoon the same monk came again and asked for a hoe in order to make some repairs in the monastery. This time the layman gave him what he wanted without showing him any respect; he simply kicked the hoe over in the monk's direction. When members of his family asked why he showed so much respect in the morning but none in the afternoon, he replied that in the morning he had paid respects to the Sangha, not to the immoral monk.

We do not agree with those who maintain that giving to immoral persons is like watering a poisonous plant. The volition of the donor as the gift is made must be taken into account. If the donor means to encourage immoral acts, then that is like watering a poisonous plant. But if the donor's attitude is like the layman's just mentioned, then the gift is above reproach.

Nor do we agree with those who maintain that the recipient's character is no concern of the donor, that the donor should give as though the recipient were an Arahant. Disciples of other teachers wrongly believe their teachers to be noble, enlightened, Arahats. This sort of wrong belief is called "drawing the wrong conclusion" (//Micchadhimokkha//). Surely it would be drawing the wrong conclusion for someone to pretend an immoral person was enlightened knowing full well that it was not true.

The donor should bear in mind while making a gift that Bodhisattas give without discriminating. We should strive to do the same. In that way, our intention will not be to encourage someone in immoral acts, nor will we be drawing a wrong conclusion about the recipient's development, and our gift will be pure. Some people point out that it is difficult to control our minds in this way, especially when we have a person in front of us that we know to be immoral. The answer to this is that we should strive to make good intentions a habit. We should cultivate the habit of directing our gifts to the Sangha, as Ugga and the other laymen mentioned above did.

4 kinds of Gifts to the Sangha

Four kinds of gifts to the Sangha are mentioned in "The Book of Discipline" (//Vinaya//), but these do not concern the layman. They are distinctions which are important for the monks who receive the gifts so they will know how to distribute the gifts inside the Order of monks. These four categories are: 1) face-to-face gifts to the Sangha (//Sammukhabhuta sanghika//), 2) gifts made in the monastery (//Aramattha s.//), 3) gifts to the Sangha wherever (monks) may be (//Gata-gata s.//), 4) gifts to the Sangha from the four corners of the world (//Catuddisa s.//). Face-to-face gifts refer to offering to monks in a town or village. They are to be distributed among the monks present at the time. Gifts made in the monastery are to be divided among the monks residing in the monastery. Gifts to the Sangha wherever monks may be, mean that if someone gives several gifts to a solitary monk, he may divide them with any monks he encounters. On the other hand, if he is clever in using the rules, he can keep all the gifts. Gifts to the Sangha from the four corners of the world include immovable gifts, such as a monastery, which are used by monks coming from all over.

20) Gifts made at special times (//Kala//) and gifts made at any time (//Akala//).

Gifts made on special occasions such as giving Kathina robes (at the end of the rainy season), food for a sick monk, food for visiting monks, etc. are gifts made at special times. They result in specific good results that do not accompany gifts made at any time. For example, when the time is ripe for such deeds to bear fruit, if the donor wishes for something special to eat he will receive it immediately.

21) Gifts made (in the recipient's) presence (//Paccakkha//) and gifts made without (the donor) being present (//Apaccakkha//).

22) Gifts that can be matched (//Sadisa//) and incomparable gifts (//Asadisa//).

A gift that can be matched by someone else is the first type. A gift that cannot be equalled is an incomparable gift. Only one such gift is given during each Buddha's time. The story of the gift made during Buddha Gotama's time is found in the //Dhammapada// commentary (Buddhist legends, III, pp. 24-28).

The Incomparable Gift of King Pasenadi

King Pasenadi of Kosala entered into a contest with the citizens of the capital of Savatthi. Each tried to outdo the other in making presents to the Buddha and Sangha. After six rounds of giving, the king felt discouraged, but his queen, Mallika, said that he could win by giving things which the citizens could not obtain, such as white parasols (symbol of royality), elephants, and by having young ladies of the warrior caste present perfumes and fan the monks. So, King Pasenadi made the incomparable gift to Gotama Buddha. And every other Buddha had a similar gift given to him by a layman.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY THREES

1) Gifts can be divided into three types as lesser (//Hina//), medium (//Mahjjhima//) and excellent (//Panita//).

The degrees of benevolence is determined according to the strength of the intention (//Chanda//), the conscious state (//Citta//), energy (//Viriya//) and investigation (//Vimamsa//). When these four elements are weak, the gift is a lesser gift. When they are neither weak nor strong, the gift is a medium gift. When they are strong, the gift is an excellent gift, a gift of higher order.

If a gift is made through a desire for fame, it is a lesser gift. If the object of the gift is future well-being as a human or a celestial being, it is a medium gift. If the person making the gift does so in imitation of the Ariyas or Bodhisattas, paying homage to their good habits, the gift is an excellent gift.

At the first council, when the texts were being prepared, the names of those who gave monasteries were given to these monasteries. For example, the Jetavana monastery was named after the rich man Anathapindika and called the Anathapindikarama; the monastery given by Ghosita was named the Ghositarama. This was to encourage others to follow their example and acquire merits. So donors today should go along with this tradition, but in giving their name to a monastery they should keep under control any desire for fame through mindfulness.

Another way of understanding these three types of gifts is to say that the desire for well-being as a human or a celestial being is involved in lesser gifts; the desire for the knowledge of awakening (or enlightenment) as a disciple (//savaka-bodhi-nana//) or as a non-teaching Buddha (//Pacceka-bodhi-nana//) is involved in a medium gift; whereas desire for the knowledge of one of the four paths (//magga-nana//). It has been said that in order for the gift to become the foundation for Nibbana (//Vivatta-nissita//), one should not be casual or careless while making a gift nor desire any particular stage of enlightenment.

2) A second group of three types of gifts are: gifts fit for a slave (//Dana-dasa//), gifts fit for friends (//Dana-sahaya//), and gifts fit for a master (//Dana-samin//).

If one gives a gift that is less valuable than what one is used to using oneself, it is a gift fit for a slave. If the gift's value is equal to what one spends on oneself, it is a gift fit for a friend. If the gift is more valuable or nobler than what one uses oneself, it is a gift fit for a master.

3) Again, gifts can be divided into three as follows: the gift of the texts of the doctrine (//Amisa-dhamma-dana//, literally: the material gift or the "raw" gift of the doctrine), the gift of mental objects (//Dhamma-dana 1//; in the sense of "dhamma" as mental activity), and the gift to the ultimate truth (//Dhamma-dana 2//; in the sense of "dhamma" as the truth concerning the nature of reality -- the truth which transcends conditioning). This division by three is based on various possible meanings of the word "Dhamma".

The gift of the texts of the doctrine (//Amisa-dhamma-dana, pr Pariyatti//) means giving knowledge or theory of the texts. This knowledge or theory is the thing given. The listener is the recipient. The teacher is the donor.

The first type of //Dhamma-dana// means giving the means to perceive mental objects. In the Abhidhamma, six aspects are given for mental objects: 1) the five organs of sense (sight, hearing, smell, taste and touch -- the mind is already included in the term "mental objects" -- //Pasadas//), 2) the sixteen subtle forms (//Sukhuma-rupa//), 3) the 89 states of consciousness (//Citta//), 4) 52 mental factors (//Cetasika//), 5) //Nibbana// and 6) Concepts (//Pannatti//). These include mental objects which exist and can appear to the mind.

One makes the gift of mental objects through curing another's weak eyes, or hearing, etc. The most complete form for this type of gift to take is in saving or sparing another's life (//Jivita-dana//).

The second type of //Dhamma-dana// is giving to the Dhamma, to the doctrine discovered by the Buddha and taught by him. In a sense, the texts themselves are also included here as they include the doctrine to another person, here, the gift is to the doctrine itself.

Gifts to the Dhamma, the Example of Ananda

An illustration of how a gift to the doctrine is made is found in the //Bhikkhaparampara Jataka// (no. 496). At one time, the Buddha was residing in the Jetavana monastery in Savatthi. One day a faithful disciple reflected that he constantly paid honour to the Buddha and to the Sangha, and he wondered if it is possible to pay honour to the Dhamma. So he asked the Buddha how he should go about it. The Buddha replied that he should give food, robes, etc. to the monks but with the intention of honouring the doctrine as cultivated by them. The disciple asked who would be an appropriate monk to receive such a gift, and the Buddha told him to make the gift to Ananda. So he invited Ananda and gave him a rich offering of flowers, food and enough cloth for three robes, keeping in mind as he gave that the object of his gift was the doctrine practised by Ananda. But Ananda thought to himself that this gift would be more worthy of the chief disciple known as the Treasurer of the Doctrine, so he made the gift over to Sariputta. Sariputta in turn decided to give the gift to the Lord of the Doctrine, the Buddha. The Buddha, seeing no one higher than himself in this respect, ate the food and accepted the cloth for the robes.

In this story, the disciple is the donor, the flowers, food and cloth are the things given, and the Dhamma realized by Ananda, Sariputta and the Buddha is the recipient. Another example of gifts to the Dhamma is found in King Asoka's donations of monasteries. Each monastery he gave was done with the intention of giving to every line of the doctrine. Many people have heard of Asoka's example and some have wanted to give in imitation of it. But it is important that they understand that the main objective is the paying of respects to the Dhamma and not merely the giving of a monastery.

We can better appreciate this type of gift if we are aware of the Dhamma's importance. Buddhaghosa makes the wish, "May the true Dhamma long endure! May all beings be respectful towards the Dhamma!" (//Ciram titthatu saddhamo, Dhamma hontu sagarava sabbepi satta//. See the end of this commentary, //Atthasalini//, on the //Dhammasangani// of the Abhidhamma -- A Buddhist Manual, cited above.) The Dhamma is of such importance because as long as it is present the teachings of the Buddha will not lose their strength. Everyone who has respect for the Dhamma will have respect for the Buddha's teachings. As the Buddha said, "He who sees the Dhamma sees me." And just before his demise he said, "The Dhamma will be your teacher after I am gone."

4) Another way of determining three types of gifts is to divide them according to gifts which is painful to give (//Dukkhasa-dana//), great gifts (//Maha-dana//) and general gifts (//Samanna-dana//).

Gifts which it is Painful to Give

The example of Darubhandaka

An example of a gift which it is painful or difficult to give is found in the story of Darubhandaka-Mahatissa (found in the commentary to the //Anguttara//, "The Book of Gradual Sayings"). Darubhandaka was a poor man who lived in Mahagama (in Sri Lanka) and who earned his living selling fire wood. He said to his wife that though the Buddha had spoken in favour of continual generosity (//Nibaddha-dana//), they could not afford this. On the other hand they could give twice each month. So they decided to give some rice the next day. Now at that time the monks received food in plenty and the young monk who received their rice threw it away.

The wife saw this and reported it to her husband. The husband said, "We are so poor we cannot give the monks food that will please them. What should we do?"

"Those who have children are not poor", replied the wife in order to encourage him and advised him to obtain money by placing their daughter as a servant. They obtained twelve kahapanas and were able to buy a cow. Because of the pure moral intentions of the couple, the cow yielded great quantities of milk which they offered twice each day to the monks. The milk they got in the evening was used for making cheese and butter and the milk they got in the morning the wife used in cooking milk porridge. These offerings were satisfactory to the monks.

"Well now," the husband told his wife one day, "thanks to our daughter we are no longer ashamed. We are able to make offerings acceptable to the monks. You should not miss the opportunity for making donations to the monks during my absence. I am going to hire out my services in order to earn some extra money so that we can have our daughter back." And he went to work for six months in a sugar mill.

When he had saved up twelve kahapanas, he set out on the road home. On the way he met Pindapatiya-Tissa, a monk from the monastery Ambariya-vihara. This monk's name indicated that he made a practice of mixing all the food he received in his bowl and ate it without enjoying the separate tastes of the various foods given. Darubhandaka walked along with the monk, listening to him talk about the doctrine. Eventually they approached a village where a man was coming out carrying cooked rice.

Darubhandaka, seeing it was mealtime, and wishing to offer the monk food, asked the man to sell the rice for one kahapana, even though the rice was not worth a twentieth as much. The man, realising that there must be some special reason for offering so much money, declined. Darubhandaka increased his offer to two, then three kahapanas. Still the man refused. Finally, Darubhandaka explained why he wanted the food and confessed that he had offered all his money. The monk, at his request, was already waiting under the shade of a tree for his meal. And, if he sold the rice, the man too would make merit.

Finally the man sold the rice for twelve kahapanas. Darubhandaka took it with great pleasure to the monk. Pindapatiya-Tissa only accepted half of the rice, but Darubhandaka urged him to take all, saying, "Venerable sir, this food is only sufficient for one person. I will not eat any of it. I bought it for you. Please take pity on me and accept all the food." So the monk accepted the other half.

After the monk finished his meal they continued their journey together and he asked Darubhandaka about himself. Darubhandaka related his story very frankly and the monk thought to himself, "This man has made a gift which is very difficult to make. I should be grateful to him. If I can find a suitable place for meditation, I will make the effort to attain Arahantship in one sitting. Though my skin and sinews and bones become dry, though all my flesh and blood dry up, I will not stir until I attain the final goal!" When he arrived at the monastery named Tissamaharama he made his great effort, not even getting up to go on the alms round.

When the seventh day dawned he became an Arahant together with the four branches of logical analysis. And he thought to himself, "My body is so exhausted. Do I have long to live?" And through the powers he had acquired, he knew that he would soon die. So he put everything in his cell in order and taking his robe and bowl went to the center of the monastery compound. There he had the drums sounded to assemble all the monks.

When all the monks were assembled, the head Thera asked who had called for the assembly. Pindapatiya-Tissa replied that he had done so. When asked why, he replied that he did not desire anything, but that if any of the monks had any misgivings about the Paths and Fruition-states of the four degrees of enlightenment, they should ask him for an explanation. The head Thera replied that no one had any questions. He then asked why Pindapatiya-Tissa had persevered in his practice at the cost of his life. So Tissa related all that had happened and informed the monks that he would pass away the same day. Then he said, "May my corpse and the structure supporting it not move until Darubhandaka comes and lifts it." And he passed away that very day.

King Kakavannatissa came and ordered his men to take the body and the supporting structure to the place for cremation, but they could not move the body or structure. After enquiring about the reason for this, the king sent for Darubhandaka, dressed him in fine clothes, and asked him to move what his men had not been able to budge. Darubhandaka did as he was told, and was able to lift the body and the structure over his head. No sooner had he done so than they rose in the air and travelled through the air to the funeral pyre.

Darubhandaka's gift is called a gift which it is painful or difficult to give because of the great sacrifice he had to make in giving it. His six-month's wages which were to redeem his daughter from servitude were used to buy one meal of cooked rice to give to a monk. And his daughter was a servant because he needed money to buy a cow in order to give food acceptable to the monks.

The example of Bhattabhatika

Another example is found in the story of Sukha Samanera's past life (when his name was Bhattabhatika) in the //Dhammapada// commentary (Buddhist Legends, II, pp. 318-324). Bhattabhatika was a poor villager who wanted to eat a rich man's meal. The rich man, Gandha, told him that if he would work for him for three years, he would give him such a meal. Bhattabhatika agreed. But when he obtained his meal, a Pacceka Buddha came, and he gave his meal to the Buddha without hesitation.

The example of the Poor Girl.

In the //Ummadanti Jataka// (no. 527) we have the example of a poor girl who was about to dress herself in clothes which she worked for three years to acquire, but at that moment a monk who was a follower of the Buddha Kassapa came by, covering himself with leaves because he had been robbed of his robes. Her gift, too, was one which it is difficult to give.

Great gifts (//Maha-dana//) are those of great magnitude. For example, King Asoka, when he learned from Moggaliputta-Tissa Thera that there were 84,000 sections of the Dhamma (//Dhamma-khandas//), honoured these by giving 84,000 monasteries. That is why Moggaliputta-Tissa said, "No one has given this much during the Buddha's dispensation, not even during the Buddha's lifetime. Your offering is the greatest." Even so, Asoka's gift is not to be compared with the incomparable gift (//Asadise//) given by King Pasenadi during the Buddha's lifetime, for Asoka's gift was done on his own initiative whereas Pasenadi's was done in competing with the citizens of the capital city Savatthi.

General gifts (//Samanna-dana//) mean those which are neither difficult to give nor of great magnitude.

5) Another way of determining three types of gifts is found in the commentary to the //Vinaya// ("The Book of the Discipline", VI, p.222, note 14): one gives to the //Sangha// (the Order of monks), a shrine or to an individual after having determined to make a gift to one of these three. These are called righteous gifts (//Dhammika Danas//) because the gifts are made in a fitting manner, in accordance with the Dhamma; they are suitable gifts. Further details concerning these three sorts of gifts will be found below in the discussion of nine types of gifts.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY FOURS

The texts do not give any lists of types of gifts by fours. We may take the mention of gifts of the four requisites, found in the //Vinaya// (The Book of the Discipline), "Middle Lengths Sayings" (I, pp. 325, 335, for example), etc., as four types of gifts. These four reqisites which it is appropriate to give to monks and nuns are: 1) robe-material or robes (//civara-dana//), 2) food (//pindapata-dana//), 3) lodging (//senasana-dana//), and 4) medicines (//bhesajja-dana//). The third gift includes monasteries, sites for monasteries, beds, etc.

Gifts may also be divided into four types according to the purity of the giver and receiver. These will be discussed in more detail in the last section below on the good results of gifts. The four possible combinations are: 1) the giver is moral but the receiver is not; 2) the receiver is moral but the giver is not; 3) both are immoral; 4) both are moral.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY FIVES

1) There are five types of gifts which are to be given at the right time (//Kala-dana//). They are found in "The Gradual Sayings" (III, p.33): one gives 1) to a newcomer, 2) to someone going away, 3) to the sick, 4) when food is hard to get, 5) the first-fruits of the field and orchard are first presented to the virtuous. The fifth type refers to gifts made by farmers, but we can understand it to include gifts made by those who have gained something through their own effort and who first make a gift of some of it before using it for themselves.

The verse concluding this description of five types of gifts includes the statement that "both those who praise the offering and those who do the deed share in its merit."

2) There are five types of gifts made by those who are immoral (//Asappurisa-dana//): a person who is immoral gives 1) unrespectfully, without taking care, in an unthorough manner (//Asakkaccam//); 2) without having first paid respects, or without considering if the gifts are appropriate or not (//Acittikatva//); 3) without presenting his gifts with his own hands (//Asahattha//); 4) leftovers (//Apaviddha//); 5) without the (right) view that one comes back again (according to the deeds one has done) (//Anagamanaditthiko// -- also known as "knowledge that (the results) of one's own deeds are one's own property", //Kammassakata-panna//).

An example of the third type is found in the story of King Payasi who could have given his gifts with his own hands, but had his attendant Uttara do so instead (See "Dialogues of the Buddha", II, no. 23).

These five types of gifts and the next five are found in "The Gradual Sayings" (III, p.129).

3) There are also the five types of gifts given by moral men (//Sappurisa-dana//): a person who is moral gives 1) respectfully, taking care, in a thorough manner (//Sakkaccam//); 2) having first paid respects, or considering whether the gifts are appropriate or not (//Cittikatva//); 3) presenting his gifts with his own hands (//Sahattha//); 4) gifts which are not leftovers (//Anapaviddha//); 5) with the (right) view that one comes back again (according to the deeds one has done) (//Agamanaditthiko//).

4) Another five types of gifts given by moral men are given together with the good results coming from them (see "The Gradual Sayings", III, p.130). The good man gives 1) having faith (in the law of cause and effect) (//Saddha-dana//), 2) respectfully, taking care, in a thorough manner (//Sakkacca-dana//); 3) when it is timely (//Kala-dana//); 4) out of kindness (//Anuggaha-dana//); 5) without harming himself or others (//Anupaghata-dana//). The third type means that one offers food when it is mealtime, robes on the suitable occasion, etc.

All five of these types of gifts result in wealth, riches and great property. In addition, each of the five gives the following results (in the same order): 1) one is fair to look upon, handsome, as beautiful as a lotus; 2) one's family and subordinates pay attention, listen to what one says and serve one keeping the goal of right knowledge in view; 3) the possessions that one gets are obtained at the right time and are abundant; 4) the mind is well disposed to enjoy in full the joy resulting from the senses; 5) no harm comes, to one's property -- at no time and from no direction, whether it be fire or water, governments (literally: kings) or thieves, or impious heirs.

5) The five opposites of these types of gifts are not given in the texts. But we can assume that five corresponding gifts made by immoral men would be:

1. Giving without belief in the law of cause and effect; that is, giving out of imitation of others or because one is afraid of being criticised (//Asaddha-dana//). Through such gifts, the donor will be wealthy later, but he will not be handsome.

2. Giving without properly preparing what is given; giving carelessly (//Asakkacca-dana//). Through such gifts, wealth comes, but one's followers may not be obedient.

3. Giving at an unsuitable time (//Akala-dana//). One will obtain wealth, but the results may not be so many or come at the right time.

4. Giving as if doing one's duty, but without any intention of honouring the receiver (//Ananuggaha-dana//). One will receive wealth but one's property will be subject to destruction or to problems coming from enemies.

In reference to timely gifts and gifts given at an unsuitable time, one should be mindful not to make donations to the Buddha, monks, etc, at the wrong time, even if one has the best of intentions. For example, one should not offer light during the daytime when it is light or give food in the afternoon to monks, as it is against their rules for them to eat in the afternoon.

6) There are five types of gifts which ordinary people think are included in benevolence but which are harmful, unmeritorious. These include 1) a gift of intoxicants (//Majja-dana//); 2) a gift of a festival (//Samajja-dana//); 3) a gift of woman (//Itthi-dana//); 4) a gift of a bull (//Usabha-dana//); 5) a gift of pictures (//Cittakamma-dana//). These gifts are mentioned in reference to gifts to monks (see "The Book of Discipline", VI, p.207). The last three are gifts made to excite sensual desire -- Women given for sexual pleasure, bulls to be led to mate with cows, and pornographic pictures.

These were mentioned by the Buddha as immoral gifts because the donor cannot give them out of good intentions. Some people think that they should give opium to someone who is addicted to opium because he will die without it. They consider that they are givin them life (//Jivita-dana//). But the intention behind such gifts cannot be benevolent, and it is therefore not suitable.

Vessantara and the Gift of Intoxicants

In the //Vessantara Jataka// (no. 547) intoxicants are included in the great gift of seven hundreds made by Vessantara (see "Jataka Stories", VI, p.256). Some say that this is because Vessantara did not want for anyone to be able to say that there was anything missing in his great gift. They say that since Vessantara did not want anyone to drink the intoxicants, there was no wrong intention involved. But persons such as Vessantara are not afraid of being criticized for not doing what is wrong. The guilt involved in intoxicants is in drinking it. Using it as a lotion or for medical purposes is not immoral. So we should rather say that it is for these reasons that Vessantara included liquor in his great gift.

7) The five great gifts (//Maha-danani//). In "The Book of Gradual Sayings" (IV, pp. 167-169) five great gifts are mentioned. The commentary explains this as "five determinations in giving" (//cetana-danani//). These five determinations correspond to keeping the five precepts. The noble disciple abstains from taking life, from stealing, from sensuous indulgence, from lying and from the use of intoxicants which cause indolence. Abstaining in this manner means that he gives to countless beings without fear, hatred or ill-will. Through giving in this manner, he gains unbounded fearlessness, amity and good-will.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY GROUPS OF SIX

As with the groups of gifts by fours, there is no direct mention of six types of gifts in the texts. The commentary to the first part of the Abhidhamma ("The Expositor", pp. 101-108) gives a detailed description of six types of gifts in connection with the six senses: colour, sound, odour, taste, objects of touch and mind-objects.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY GROUPS OF SEVEN

Similarly, a group of seven types of gifts are not mentioned in the texts, but we can include gifts to the Sangha (//Sangika-dana//). See above under `Types of Gifts by Pairs', part (19).

TYPES OF GIFTS BY GROUPS OF EIGHT

1) Eight ways of making gifts are given in "The Book of Gradual Sayings", IV, p.160.

1. One gives spontaneously. (This would include paying respects to the receiver as soon as she or he arrives.)

2. One gives out of fear. (This would include fear of having a bad reputation or from fear of going to the lower realms of suffering.)

3. One gives, thinking, "he gave to me."

4. One gives, thinking, "he will give to me."

5. One gives, thinking, "it is good to give."

6. One gives, thinking, "I prepare food, they do not; though I cook, I am not worthy to stop giving to those who prepare no food." (This means that one does not wish to eat any food before giving to those who do not prepare their food -- i.e. monks.)

7. One gives in order to have a good reputation.

8. One gives in order to attain a more malleable mind. (This would be giving with the idea that it will help one to be better concentrated and that it will help in gaining insight.)

The eighth of these ways of giving is the best, as it leads one to attain the states of absorption (//Jhanas//). And, whether concentration is developed as highly as this or not, it leads one to the unconditioned state (//Nibbana//). The first seven ways of giving do not encourage the mind to develop in concentration. The first and fifth ways of giving are of great excellence (//Panita//), however. The seventh way of giving is a lower sort (//Hina//), and the others (2,3,4 and 6) are of average worth (//Majjhima//). (Cf. Types of gifts by threes, (1).)

We have already mentioned that there are two kinds of giving: 1. meritorious giving (//Punnavisaya-dana//) and 2. worldly giving (//Lokavisaya-dana//). (See above, Types of gifts). Of these eight ways of giving the first, fifth and eighth are meritorious gifts whereas the others are worldly giving.

2) Another group of eight ways of making gifts is given in the chapter following the first list "The Book of Gradual Sayings", IV, p.161):

1. One gives out of affection (taking //Chanda// to mean "affection" (//pema//) as the commentary says). (This includes the donor's knowing the receiver and feeling affection for him or her.)

2. One gives out of exasperation. (One is unwilling to give and feels hatred, but the act cannot be avoided.)

3. One gives out of delusion (//Moha//). (This includes gifts made through foolishness and ignorance, by someone who does not understand the law of cause and effect.)

4. One gives out of fear (//Bhaya//). (Fear of having a bad reputation, fear of going to the lower realms, fear resulting from threats made by the recipient.)

5. One gives, thinking, "This is the tradition of my ancestors. I must carry on the tradition."

6. One gives, thinking, "I will be reborn in a heavenly realm."

7. One gives, thinking, "Gifts bring my heart peace; joy and gladness are obtained."

8. One gives in order to attain a more malleable mind (for better concentration and insight -- as above).

With this group, as before, the eighth is the best; the sixth and seventh are excellent also. These three are meritorious giving. The first five ways of giving are lower sorts of giving and are of the worldly type of gifts.

3) There are eight types of (good) rebirths resulting from gifts (//Danupapatti//). These are found in "Gradual Sayings" (VI, p.163; see also, "Dialogues of the Buddha", III, p.240).

For each type a virtuous person gives to monks or moral men hoping for something in return. For the first type he can see for himself, for the others he hears of the good things associated with different planes of existence -- on the human plane and higher. For the first seven types the virtuous person fixes his mind on the thought, directs his attention to it and develops the thought of being reborn in his next life in the plane mentioned. For the eighth type, he must develop freedom from greed. "The mental aspiration of the virtuous prospers because of its purity (//Visuddhatta//)", the Buddha said.

A person gives with the intention of being reborn in the following planes of existence and therefore is reborn:

1. as a wealthy human being,

2. in the plane of the four great kings (the guardians of the four cardinal points) (//Catu-Maharajika-deva//),

3. in the plane of the thirty-three (//Tavatimsa//).

4. in the Yama plane

5. in the Tusita plane,

6. in the plane of the devas who delight in creating (//Nimmana-rati//),

7. in the plane of the devas who have power over other's creations (//Paranimmita-vasavatti//),

8. in the Brahma planes.

For all the planes above the human plane, one is motivated because one hears that beings in those planes are beautiful, enjoy great pleasure and live for a long time. The Brahma planes are not directly reached through generosity, but through the four sublime abodes (//Brahma-vihara//): loving kindness (//Metta//), compassion (//Karuna//), sympathetic joy (//Mudita//) and equanimity (//Upekkha//); or, through the absorption states (//Jhanas//), or through insight (for the planes which are the domain of non-returners).

4) The distinction between the fact that gifts can lead to rebirth in the human world and six deva planes whereas access to the Brahma planes comes through developing concentration and insight is made clear in the discourse following the one above ("Gradual Sayings", IV, pp. 164-166). The Buddha says that there are three foundations of meritorious acts: gifts, morality, and meditation (//Bhavana//, developing concentration and insight). If concentration and insight are not developed, if a person only does meritorious acts of giving and observing the moral rules, then he will be reborn in eight possible states, depending on whether these two types of meritorious acts are developed on a small scale (the first case), a medium scale (the second case), or to a high degree (numbers 3-8).

Meritorious acts based on giving and observing morality lead to rebirth as

1. a human being of the lower type who experiences bad-luck (the commentary mentions trappers, rush-plaiters, cartwrights and vermin-killers),

2. men who are fortunate (the commentary mentions nobles, Brahmins, merchants),

3. a deva in the plane of the four great kings,

4. a deva in the plane of the thirty-three,

5. a deva in the Yama plane,

6. a deva in the Tusita plane,

7. a deva in the plane of those who delight in creating,

8. a deva in the plane of those who have powers over others' creations.

5) The following discourse ("Gradual Sayings", IV, p.166) lists the eight types of gifts made by a moral person (//Sappurisa-dana//): 1) clean (things) (this would include making the gifts pure, clean and attractive), 2) choice gifts, 3) suitable gifts (for the receiver), 4) timely gifts, 5) gifts given with care (this would include giving to those who are moral, who follow the Buddha's teachings rather than to those who are immoral as well as the fact that one would choose only good gifts if one possesses good and bad things that could be given), 6) one gives continuously, 7) without calming the mind, 8) regretting that one gave after having done so.

TYPE OF GIFTS BY GROUPS OF NINE

There is mention in "The Book of Discipline" (VI, p.222) that there are nine gifts that are not legally valid. They are given in detail in the commentary (see "The Book of Discipline", VI, p.222, note 12). Gifts which are meant for the Sangha, a shrine or an individual (see Types of Gifts by Threes, 4)) but which a monk causes the donor to give to another group of monks, another shrine or to an individual (i.e., all nine possibilities of the combinations) are illegal. In other words, once someone has made up his mind to make a gift to an Order of monks, a shrine or an individual, it is wrong for another person to persuade him to give to a different Order of monks, a different shrine or to a different individual.

This rule was made by the Buddha on an occasion given in "The Book of Discipline", II, pp. 160-163. Once when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Savatthi, a group of men decided to offer food and robes to the Order of monks. But the group of six immoral monks persuaded them to give them the robes instead. When the modest monks heard of this, they denounced what they had done and reported the matter to the Buddha. The Buddha had the six immoral monks called and asked them if what had been reported were true. When they admitted it was, he rebuked them and made the following rule, "Whatever monk should knowingly appropriate to himself an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture." (I.B. Horner trans.) "Benefit" in food, lodgings, and medicine; also included are small items such as a lump of plaster, a toothpick or unwoven thread.

A similar incident, involving procuring something for another person rather than for oneself, is found in "The Book of Discipline", III, pp.

67-69. This rule does not mean that a monk cannot urge someone to give a gift to the Order rather than to himself in order for that person to make more merit. An illustration of this is found in the story of Maha-Pajapati who wanted to give robe material to the Order of monks. The commentary says that although she was disappointed, the Buddha was acting out of compassion, as a gift to the Order is of great merit, and a gift to the Order headed by him would doubly inspire the right thoughts associated with giving. Ananda urged the Buddha to accept the gift, pointing out that she had been established by the Buddha in the Triple Refuge, in the five precepts, and in unwavering confidence in both these and the Four Noble Truths. The Buddha's reply to Ananda indicates that he knew that Maha-Pajapati thought she could repay the Buddha through her gift, but he says that one cannot repay such a gift, i.e., the gift of the Dhamma.

King Pasenadi and Bribes

Another situation which would not be included in these nine cases of misappropriating gifts is found in the //Bharu Jataka// (no. 213). King Pasenadi took bribes from some heretics and gave them permission to build a center near the Jetavana monastery. The Buddha, knowing that this would result in endless disputes, went to the king and told him the story of King Bharu and how a similar situation had led to much suffering. The king was persuaded not to take the bribe and built the Rajakarama monastery which he gave to the Buddha to make amends.

It is also possible for the donor to change his mind himself and there is nothing wrong with this. For example, if a person prepares gifts for visiting monks, then in the meantime monks who are established in one of the stages of enlightenment arrive, he may change his mind and give the gifts to them.

TYPES OF GIFTS BY GROUPS OF TEN

Gifts by groups of ten are not directly mentioned in the texts, but ten things to be given are mentioned in the commentaries (see above, //Dana// (generosity) and //Pariccaga// (abandonment)).

TYPES OF GIFTS BY GROUPS OF FOURTEEN

THE GOOD RESULTS OF GIFTS

1) The example of Velukantaki

In the "Gradual Sayings", III, pp.45-38, in the story of Nanda's mother, Velukantaki, three qualities that should be present in the donor and three qualities that should be present in the receiver are given. Velukantaki was a disciple of the Buddha who had practised the teachings and reached the stage of Non-returner. She had also developed the special powers that come with the absorption states. One day, through her powers, she saw Vessavana, one of the Four Great Kings of the first deva world. He told her that the two chief disciples, Sariputta and Moggalana, were coming to her town (Velukanta) with a group of monks. When he learned she would invite them for a meal, Vessavana asked for her to share the merits of the gift with him. She invited them, and after the meal explained how she had learned they were coming. When they expressed their amazement at her ability to see beings in other planes of existence, she told them of four other achievements: when her son Nanda was taken by the king's men and killed before her eyes she was not perturbed; nor was she upset when her husband reappeared before her after his death as a Yakkha; she kept the precepts perfectly; she could enter the absorption states at will; and she had cast aside the five lower fetters (//samyogana//: personality-belief, sceptical doubt, clinging to mere rules and rituals, sensuous craving).

The Buddha said that when she gave her gift, she possessed three qualities that are appropriate for the donor: 1) feeling happy before making the gift, 2) satisfied while giving (i.e., clear of mind and intention), 3) rejoicing after having made the gift. So, the gift was complete from the point of view of the giver. It was also complete in regards to the recipients, as they possessed the three qualities of being free from desire, aversion and ignorance; or, they were on the way to being liberated from these three.

The Buddha concluded by saying that the benefits that would result from such a gift would be immeasurable, just as the water in the ocean is immeasurable.

2) The example in the //Mahadhammapala Jataka//

In the //Mahadhammapala Jataka// (no.447) we see that in a past life, King Suddhodana, the Buddha's father, had been a religious teacher who went to see the father of one of his pupils after learning that everyone in that family lived till old age. He asked the father the secret to their long life. The father, Mahadhammapala, answered that they all lived moral lives, including generosity. They were happy before giving, content as they gave, and rejoiced after giving. That was why no one died young in their family. The same stanza concerning gifts occurs in the preface story to the //Mayhaka Jataka// (no. 390) where the Buddha speaks of a man who regretted his gift after giving it. The gift brought him riches, but his change of heart made it impossible for him to enjoy the riches.

3) There are four qualities for a gift which brings great results in one's present lifetime (given in detail in the Dhammapada commentary, "Buddhist Legends", II, p.323, and in "The Expositor", p. 214; the order given here follows the latter):

1. The requisites (to be given) were obtained through righteousness and equity (//Paccayanam dhammikata//).

2. They are given with greatness of volition (//Catanamahatta//), by one who gives in faith and confidence in the law of cause and effect.

3. They are given to someone of high attainment (//Vatthusampatti//), an Arahat or a Non-returner.

4. The recipient is of exceeding merit (//Gunatireka//), meaning he or she has just attained the unconditioned state (//Nirodhasampatti//).

Gifts of this sort, bringing results in their present life, were made by people such as Punna (story in "Buddhist Legends", III, pp. 99-103), Kakavaliya (see "The Path of Purification", Ch. XII, para 127), and the gardener Sumana (Buddhist Legends, II, pp. 123-127). In "The Expositor" these four qualities for a gift are called the four purities of gifts (//Dakkhina-visuddhi//), and in "Buddhist Legends" they are called the four attainments (//Sampada//).

4) Another list of four kinds of purity associated with gifts (//Dakkhina-visuddhi//) is given in "The Middle Length Sayings" (III, pp.304-305):

1. A gift purified by the giver but not by the recipient. (Even if the recipient is immoral (//dussila//), if the donor gives what has been rightly obtained, has the right attitude before, during and after making the gift, and has faith in the law of cause and effect, then the gift is pure through the donor and is of great benefit.)

2. A gift is purified by the recipient and not by the donor. (Even if the donor is immoral, has not obtained the gift in the right way, does not have faith in the law of cause and effect, and does not have the right attitude, if the recipient is moral the gift is pure through the recipient and of great benefit.)

3. A gift purified by neither the giver nor the recipient. (If an immoral donor gives as in the second case to an immoral recipient, the gift is less beneficial -- just as a poor seed planted in poor soil will not grow as well as a good seed growing in good soil.)

The third type, of course, has no purity, but it is included to show all the cases involved. It is important that we bear in mind the five elements which accompany the gift of greatest purity: 1) the donor is moral, 2) the recipient is moral, 3) the gifts were justly earned, 4) the donor is happy before, satisfied while giving, and rejoices after making the gift, 5) the donor has faith in the law of cause and effect.

ON FAITH AND GIFTS

//Saddha//, in Pali, means faith. We can take it to mean "The dhamma which holds firmly." Just as clear water where all the dregs have sunk to the bottom can hold the image of the moon or sun, faith which is free from defilements can firmly hold to the qualities of the Buddha, etc.

If men had no hands they would not be able to pick jewels up even though they could see them. Without wealth there would be no variety of untensils. Without seeds there would be no grain, etc. Similarly, if we have no faith we cannot pick up the jewels of generosity, moral living and development of mind, etc. Without faith we would not have the pleasures of the human world, the celestial worlds or the peace of Nibbana. That is why the Buddha compared faith to having hands, wealth or seeds.

Faith is also compared to the jewel of the Universal Monarch which will clarify the water it is put in, no matter how dirty the water is.
Similarly, faith immediately dispels the defilements and makes the mind clear. When the mind is filled with faith there are no defilements such as grief, worry, etc. It will be obvious to us if we try concentrating on the qualities of the Buddha how difficult it is to cultivate faith to the exclusion of all defilements. But if while we make the effort, the mind is clear and pure through faith for only a few minutes, we should remember that we are capable of having that much faith. And we can work to maintain a clear, pure mind for longer periods, until eventually we can do so continuously.

With regards to having faith in the law of cause and effect, as mentioned above, we should remind ourselves as follows, "I will spend a certain amount in giving a gift, but it is not spent in vain. The intention is to make a gift. It is the result of this intention that will follow me through all my lives until I reach Nibbana." Moreover, one should reflect, "I will obtain good results." Through such thoughts the mind will become clear, and this clarity is what is called having faith in the law of cause and effect.

So, it is important to cultivate faith through reflecting on one's actions or on the results of the acts, for this is one of the elements that strengthens gifts.

VIPASSANA MEDITATION COURSES
at the International Meditation Centres in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin

TRAINING IN HIGHER VIRTUOUS CONDUCT TRAINING IN HIGHER MENTAL CONTROL
TRAINING IN HIGHER WISDOM

There are five Centres all with the same course structure in this Tradition. IMC-UK, IMC-WA, IMC-NSW, IMC-USA and IMC-Austria.

The International Meditation Centres were founded to provide for the instruction and practice of Theravada Buddhist Meditation. The Centres in the West are direct offsprings of the International Meditation Centres of Yangon, Myanmar (former Burma), which was founded by Sayagyi U Ba Khin. In addition to being a highly respected meditation teacher, Sayagyi U Ba Khin was the first Accountant General of Burma after Independence in 1948.

All Centres are guided by Mother Sayamagyi and Sayagyi U Chit Tin, two of Sayagyi U Ba Khin's closest disciples, who have practised and taught meditation for more than forty years and have carried on the tradition since Sayagyi's demise in 1971.

Ten-day residential courses are held usually once a month at IMC-UK and regularly at other Centres, beginning on Friday evening and ending early on Monday morning. They are led by Mother Sayamagyi and Sayagyi U Chit Tin or by a regional teacher.

The students who come to do courses at the Centres are from all walks of life, professions, religions, cultural backgrounds, races and countries. Anyone who comes with an open mind can gain the necessary confidence in the technique and in himself or herself. Thus, all can attain benefits which will be proportionate to the amount of balanced effort they make.

Buddhist meditation is the practice of the Eightfold Noble Path, as taught by the Buddha, which can be divided into three parts. These are: higher training in 1) morality, 2) concentration and 3) wisdom.

1. Morality is the common denominator of all religions. At our Centres, students observe the five precepts of refraining from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying and the use of drugs or intoxicants. By diligently observing this morality, we develop purity of physical and verbal actions.

2. Beginning with this base, training in concentration is taught (//Anapana// meditation -- mindfulness of breathing). Through learning to calm and control the mind during the first four days, the student quickly appreciates the advantages of a steady and balanced mind.

3. The third training in wisdom or insight is introduced through Vipassana meditation, which is practised throughout the remainder of the period.

Vipassana is a process which enables the student to develop concentration and awareness and, through personal experience, to gain an understanding of the truths of impermanence, suffering and non-self. Practised with diligence the gradual process of mental purification will lead to the end of suffering and to full Enlightenment or Nibbana.

The emphasis is on experiencing directly the truth for oneself by practising the technique. Noble Silence (no unnecessary talk) provides a conducive atmosphere, and discourses given in the morning and evening by the Teachers help to clarify the practice. There are also daily interviews with the Teachers.

There has never been any charge for the Buddha's Teachings. The Teachings have always been passed down from the Buddha, through the Teachers to the students, without any expectation of payment, however, the Trusts/ Associations who are responsible for running the Centre ask each student to contribute towards food and accommodation for a ten-day course (the expected contribution varies according to the standards of each country, for example in the UK it is 140 currently).

Wholesome and tasty vegetarian food in ample quantity is provided, and those who follow a diet for medical reasons will be accommodated as far as possible.

For a person who is genuinely interested, meditation (including Noble Silence) is not difficult. The results of patient practice can be quite astonishing. The day's schedule is neither too severe nor too relaxed but follows the Middle Path. Sayagyi U Ba Khin taught his students to work with "zestful ease".

People from many religions have found the meditation courses helpful and beneficial in their day-to-day lives.

Please note that the course lasts for ten days. Students should plan to remain for the full ten days without leaving the Centre.

INTERNATIONAL MEDITATION CENTRE

The International Meditation Centres were founded by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust to promote the practice of Buddhist Meditation according to the Teachings of the BUDDHA.

Ten-day residential courses are conducted regularly in the practice of the Eight-Fold Noble Path as taught by the Buddha, which comprises three stages of training: morality (//sila//), concentration or control over the mind (//samadhi//), and wisdom or insight (//panna//). Instruction in mindfulness of the breath (//anapana// meditation) is then given for five days, with the aim of quieting and concentrating the mind. The remaining days are devoted to insight meditation (//vipassana//), whereby students can experience at first hand the essential elements of Buddha's Teaching: the impermanence of all physical and mental phenomena (//anicca//), the unsatisfactory nature of all conditioned phenomena (//dukkha//), the absence of a permanent enduring self or ego in beings (//anatta//).

One should come with the understanding and intention to enter a ten-day retreat. The training, if followed diligently, will result in a calmer mind through the gradual eradication of impurities, and ultimately in the realisation of the `Nibbanic Peace within'.

To achieve a state of mind perfectly attuned and in balance, it is essential to start with a stable and sound base of conduct. For the duration of the training therefore, each student is asked to observe the five precepts as follows:

1.To refrain from killing
2.To refrain from stealing
3.To refrain from sexual misconduct
(here total celibacy)
4.To refrain from lying
5.To refrain from the use of intoxicants and drugs

All these instructions are framed in accordance with those of the International Meditation Centre, Yangon(Rangoon) Myanmar(Burma), as established by Sayagyi U Ba Khin.

During the period of training students will have to give up their previous practices, and all spiritual activities including those concerning pseudo-sciences. Students should not wear or bring with them spiritual objects or reading material of any kind.

Observance of noble silence throughout the training period will be very beneficial and conducive to a better appreciation of the teaching. This means that the students should not talk amongst themselves, but they may of course speak to the teachers and managers at any time.

During the daily interview with the teachers students should give a true and accurate account of their experiences.

THE SIX ATTRIBUTES OF THE DHAMMA

1. The Dhamma is not the result of conjecture or speculation, but the result of personal attainments, and it is precise in every respect.

2. The Dhamma produces beneficial results here and now for those who practise it in accordance with the techniques evolved by the Buddha.

3. The effect of the Dhamma on the person practising it, is immediate in that it has the quality of simultaneously removing the causes of Suffering with the understanding of the Truth of Suffering.

4. The Dhamma can stand the test of those who are anxious to try it.

5. The Dhamma is part of oneself, and is therefore susceptible to ready investigation.

6. The benefits of the Dhamma can be fully experienced by those who attain the four Paths and four Fruition States of Awakening (or Enlightenment).

Dharma Talk: Compassion

The talk below was given on 3/20/95 at the regular Monday night Dzogchen sitting group in Cambridge, MA.

This practice that we just did- this is what we call in Tibetan the "Chenrezig Sadhana," or practice of Avalokiteshvara, Bodhisattva, or Buddha of Compassion, of love, of loving kindness. My own teacher, the late and extremely great Himalayan meditation master Kalu Rinpoche, always used to teach this, all over the world, and healways used to say this this mantra himself, day andnight. If you ever saw Kalu Rinpoche, I'm sure you know that yo never saw him without beads in his left hand and saying this mantra: Om mani padme hung, the Mantra of Great Compassion. But even more importantly, the Mantra of Compassion was always circling in his own heart, as it were, like a prayer wheel, like every breath as a mantra, as compassion, as a loving concern for others.

So I've always been inspired by this practice and this kind of practice. Although in Buddhism, as we experience it in the West, we often hear about very mental aspects like wisdom, clarity, enlightenment, realization, illumination and so on... higher consciousness, awareness.... I don't think that the Buddha's teaching is really meant for the eyebrows up. The Buddha's teaching and the teachings of enlightenment more importantly... even in the Buddhist teaching, the true, authentic teachings of enlightenment, if one could say such a thing, are, if nothing else, about the heart, opening the heart and mind, not just about the mind and thought and clarity. But they're about warmth, kindness and love. Unconditional love, "divine love," so-called. True love, warmth, to speak English. Not cold detachment, but a very warm, spiritual equanimity, equal to all-detachment, which can help us to treat others as we ourselves would be treated. Actually, a training in how to do that, not just a rule that we should do that..... recognizing our intrinsic connection, our total interconnectedness.

Even more, even more scary, not just interconnected like train carscoupled by a small piece ends, but totallyinterpenetrative and inseparable. Totally interpenetrative andinseparable fro and all those around us and the entiremandala of being or holograph, cosmic web of being, Mahayanasutras as Indra's net. Each node of the net is a luminousdiamond or pearl, like a that reflects and containsall the others. Think about that. That's what mandala means, or ah Indra's net, where each of us is like a luminousjewel that reflects and therefore contains all t

So when we practice, we really, if we can, we really could settle back into that completeness. That's the completeness, the wholeness, that's the Innate Great Perfection, or Dzogchen, which the teachings refer to. That's why we often talk about clear light, luminosity or transparency or clarity. Seeing through the illusion or seeing through the contracted ego of self, we experience the interpenetrativeness with all. Seeing through the seer, we become seers, sages, who know everyone, as it were.

Since we are infinitely connected, infinitely deep, not just looking out into infinitely deep space, we can also look "in". It is also infinitely deep, infinitely rich and profound, infinitely mysterious, if you like, and unfathomable, and yet at the same time, totally coherent, fitting together, everything in its own place. Perfectly. It's like the ultimate chaos theory. Everything is coherent when you broaden the frame enough. Then you see it's actually a perfect pattern, everything fits, it's a perfect mandala or hologram. Everything fits, everything's perfect in its own way, in its own place. Shit belongs, as well as gold and pearls and rainbows. Also, shit, schmaltz and everything else. Neurosis, whatever.

And not only that, even more radically, we belong. Of all people, yes even oneself, imagine that, fits and belongs. That's what these teachings, I hate to say "reveal" - it's not a secret. That's what they highlight, underline. It is there on every line, but maybe needs to be highlighted a little bit so it's not lost in an entire thicket of words, concepts. It is so evident that we overlook it. It's so close, right under our own noses, that we never notice. Everything is that. There's nothing missing and nothing extra to get rid of in the Great Perfection.

So when we meditate through clear seeing, or the openness and awareness practice, we are entering into the wisdom side, the infinite, open side of the heart and mind. This we call the "absolute bodhi-mind." And when we practice, we generate out of that compassion, loving kindness, joy, empathy... excuse all the words, but no one word can hold them all. With a cluster, we get more of a feeling what it is all about. Not just compassion or pity.

Think about the Third World with empathy, putting ourselves in theirshoes, "walking a mile in moccasins," as the Native Americans say.Then we'll know where they are coming from, whe comingfrom, where each other are coming from. Then we can treat others as wewould be tr equalize ourselves and others. As itsays in the Mahayana: mind training or attitude transfor totreat others as yourself. To equalize oneself and others. To knowwhere others are comin others want and need the same as wedo.

The wisdom of unselfishness or selflessness reveals that real heartof interconnectedness, interpenetrativeness, and love. Then we wouldtreat everyone like we like to treat our childre beloved ones.Equalizing ourselves with others, or even more radically, putting themfirst. Th Dalai Lama says, that's the way to train: putothers first. Like, perhaps, in your best momen yourchildren first or would die for your children. If we see ourselves asone person on one si beings in this world on the otherside, we might one day do a little advanced calculus and sa really more important?"

Of course, that's a big stretch, but we just say it that way toexaggerate. But it's "me, me, me world. Think about it: three- me, myself, and I- or 6 billion? And that's only the people! What the others, creatures great and small, seen an unseen? Hard tocount them.

So, when we really put things in perspective, we can, by continuous reflection and contemplation, start to not just conclude or jump to a conclusion or make some kind of exaggerated point that the many are more important than any one of us, but we might start to really transform our attitude. Erode or loosen a little bit of our selfishness, of our self-cherishing, our egotism, whatever you want to call it...relinquish our grasping, attachment, and demandingness.

That's the way to peace. World peace and also inner peace. We'renot just talking about my like no-self, shunyata,anakima, no self, no one home. But how about just a little moregener grasping and demanding?

Let's start anywhere, anything will do. Just being a little nicerto each other or when we drive whatever. Let's startanywhere, I dare you!

No, I'm sure you are doing better than me in that regard. But nevermind. I think this is a rea for all of us to really live upto these marvelous, glittering truths that we all bandy about, subs read and write about, and even worse, teach. How hard to reallywalk our talk, to live in an e to embody the way, tomodel impeccable living for the benefit of one and all. That is thegrea embody and enact wisdom of compassion in action. Toshow that it is possible, it must show first of all. Wemust act as if it's possible-since it is. Let's make believe and gointo it.

We can work from the outside in. We can act as if it's possible tobe sane, to be loving, to liv enlightened way, to make believe fromthe outside in, as well as transforming from the inside bybit, because it does seem to take a while, this infinite journey.

BUDDHIST REFLECTIONS ON DEATH

To the average man death is by no means a pleasant subject or talk for discussion. It is something dismal and oppressive -- a veritable kill-joy, a fit topic for a funeral house only. The average man immersed as he is in the self, ever seeking after the pleasurable, ever pursuing that which excites and gratifies the senses, refuses to pause and ponder seriously that these very objects of pleasure and gratification will some day reach their end. If wise counsel does not prevail and urge the unthinking pleasure-seeking man to consider seriously that death can knock at his door also, it is only the shock of a bereavement under his own roof, the sudden and untimely death of a parent, wife or child that will rouse him up from his delirious round of sense- gratification and rudely awaken him to the hard facts of life. Then only will his eyes open, then only will he begin to ask himself why there is such a phenomenon as death. Why is it inevitable? Why are there these painful partings which rob life of its joys?

To most of us, at some moment or another, the spectacle of death must have given rise to the deepest of thoughts and profoundest of questions. What is life worth, if able bodies that once performed great deeds now lie flat and cold, senseless and lifeless? What is life worth, if eyes that once sparkled with joy, eyes that once beamed with love are now closed forever, bereft of movement, bereft of life? Thoughts such as these are not to be repressed. It is just these inquiring thoughts, if wisely pursued, that will ultimately unfold the potentialities inherent in the human mind to receive the highest truths.

According to the Buddhist way of thinking, death, far from being a subject to be shunned and avoided, is the key that unlocks the seeming mystery of life. It is by understanding death that we understand life; for death is part of the process of life in the larger sense. In another sense, life and death are two ends of the same process and if you understand one end of the process, you also understand the other end. Hence, by understanding the purpose of death we also understand the purpose of life. It is the contemplation of death, the intensive thought that it will some day come upon us, that softens the hardest of hearts, binds one to another with cords of love and compassion, and destroys the barriers of caste, creed and race among the peoples of this earth all of whom are subject to the common destiny of death. Death is a great leveler. Pride of birth, pride of position, pride of wealth, pride of power must give way to the all- consuming thought of inevitable death. It is this leveling aspect of death that made the poet say:

"Scepter and crown
Must tumble down
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade."

It is the contemplation of death that helps to destroy the infatuation of sense-pleasure. It is the contemplation of death that destroys vanity. It is the contemplation of death that gives balance and a healthy sense of proportion to our highly over- wrought minds with their misguided sense of values. It is the contemplation of death that gives strength and steadiness and direction to the erratic human mind, now wandering in one direction, now in another, without an aim, without a purpose. It is not for nothing that the Buddha has, in the very highest terms, commended to his disciples the practice of mindfulness regarding death. This is known as "//marananussati bhavana//". One who wants to practice it must at stated times, and also every now and then, revert to the thought //maranam bhavissati// -- "death will take place." This contemplation of death is one of the classical meditation-subjects treated in the //Visuddhi Magga// which states that in order to obtain the fullest results, one should practice this meditation in the correct way, that is, with mindfulness (//sati//), with a sense of urgency (//samvega//) and with understanding (//nana//). For example, suppose a young disciple fails to realize keenly that death can come upon him at any moment, and regards it as something that will occur in old age in the distant future; his contemplation of death will be lacking strength and clarity, so much so that it will run on lines which are not conducive to success.

How great and useful is the contemplation of death can be seen from the following beneficial effects enumerated in the //Visuddhi Magga//: -- "The disciple who devotes himself to this contemplation of death is always vigilant, takes no delight in any form of existence, gives up hankering after life, censures evil doing, is free from craving as regards the requisites of life, his perception of impermanence becomes established, he realizes the painful and soulless nature of existence and at the moment of death he is devoid of fear, and remains mindful and self-possessed. Finally, if in this present life he fails to attain to Nibbana, upon the dissolution of the body he is bound for a happy destiny." Thus it will be seen that mindfulness of death not only purifies and refines the mind but also has the effect of robbing death of its fears and terrors, and helps one at that solemn moment when he is gasping for his last breath, to face that situation with fortitude and calm. He is never unnerved at the thought of death but is always prepared for it. It is such a man that can truly exclaim, "O death, where is thy sting?"

II

IN THE //Anguttara Nikaya// the Buddha has said, "Oh Monks, there are ten ideas, which if made to grow, made much of, are of great fruit, of great profit for plunging into Nibbana, for ending up in Nibbana." Of these ten, one is death. Contemplation on death and on other forms of sorrow such as old age, and disease, constitutes a convenient starting point for the long line of investigation and meditation that will ultimately lead to Reality. This is exactly what happened in the case of the Buddha. Was it not the sight of an old man followed by the sight of a sick man and thereafter the sight of a dead man that made Prince Siddhattha, living in the lap of luxury, to give up wife and child, home and the prospect of a kingdom, and to embark on a voyage of discovery of truth, a voyage that ended in the glory of Buddhahood and the bliss of Nibbana?

The marked disinclination of the average man to advert to the problem of death, the distaste that arouses in him the desire to turn away from it whenever the subject is broached, are all due to the weakness of the human mind, sometimes occasioned by fear, sometimes by //tanha// or selfishness, but at all times supported by ignorance (//avijja//). The disinclination to understand death, is no different from the disinclination of a man to subject himself to a medical check-up although he feels that something is wrong with him. We must learn to value the necessity to face facts. Safety always lies in truth. The sooner we know our condition the safer are we, for we can then take the steps necessary for our betterment. The saying, "where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise" has no application here. To live with no thought of death is to live in a fool's paradise. //Visuddhi Magga// says,

> "Now when a man is truly wise,
> His constant task will surely be,
> This recollection about death,
> Blessed with such mighty potency."

Now that we have understood why such potency attaches itself to reflections on death, let us proceed to engage ourselves in such reflections. The first question that the reflecting mind would ask itself will be, "What is the cause of death?" Ask the physiologist what is death, he will tell you that it is a cessation of the functioning of the human body. Ask him what causes the cessation of the functioning of the human body, he will tell you that the immediate cause is that the heart ceases to beat. Ask him why the heart ceases to beat, he will tell you that disease in any part of the human system, if not arrested, will worsen and cause a gradual degeneration and ultimate breakdown of some organ or other of the human system, thus throwing an undue burden on the work of the heart -- the only organ that pumps blood. Hence, it is disease that ultimately cause the cessation of the heart beat. Ask the physiologist what causes the disease, he well tell you that disease is the irregular functioning (dis-ease) of the human body, or by the violation of rules of healthy living or by an accident -- each of which can impair some part or other of the human system, thus causing disease. Ask the physiologist what causes the entry of a germ or the violation of health rules or the occurrence of an accident. He will have to answer. "I do not know, I cannot say." Certainly the physiologist cannot help us this stage of our reflections of death, since the question is beyond the realm of physiology and enters the realm of human conduct. When two persons are exposed to germ infection, why should it sometimes be the man of lower resistance power who escapes the infection while the man of greater resistance succumbs to it? When three persons tread the same slippery floor, why should one slip and fall and crack his head and die, while the second slips and sustains only minor injuries, while the third does not slip at all? These are questions which clearly show that the answer is not to be expected from the physiologist whose study is the work of the human body.

Nor is the answer to be expected from a psychologist whose study is the work of the human mind only. Far, far beyond the confines of physiology and psychology is the answer to be sought. It is here that Buddhist philosophy becomes inviting. It is just here that the law of Kamma, also called the law of Cause and Effect or the law of Action and Reaction makes a special appeal to the inquiring mind. It is Kamma that steps in to answer further questions. It is Kamma that determines why one man should succumb to germ-infection while the other should not. It is Kamma that decides why the three men treading the same slippery floor should experience three different results. Kamma sees to it that each man gets in life just what he deserves, not more, nor less. Each man's condition in life with its particular share of joys and sorrows is nothing more nor less than the result of his own past actions, good and bad. Thus we see that Kamma is a strict accountant. Each man weaves his own web of fate. Each man is the architect of his own fortune. As the Buddha said in the //Anguttara Nikaya//, "Beings are the owners of their deeds. Their deeds are the womb from which they spring. With their deeds they are bound up. Their deeds are their refuge. Whatever deeds they do, good or evil, of such they will be heirs." As actions are various, reactions also are various. Hence the varying causes of death to various persons under various situations. Every cause has its particular effect. Every action has its particular reaction. This is the unfailing law.

When Kamma is referred to as a law, it must not be taken to mean something promulgated by the state or some governing body. That would imply the existence of a lawgiver. It is a law in the sense that it is a constant way of action. It is in the nature of certain actions that they should produce certain results. That nature is also called law. It is in this sense that we speak of the law of gravitation which causes a mango on the tree to fall to the ground, not that there is a supreme external power or being which commands the mango to fall. It is in the nature of things, the weight of the mango, the attraction of the earth, that the mango should fall. It is again a constant way of action. Similarly, in the realm of human conduct and human affairs, the law of cause and effect, of action and reaction, operates. (It is then called Kamma or more properly Kamma Vipaka). It is not dependent on any extraneous arbitrary power, but it is in the very nature of things that certain actions should produce certain results. Hence the birth and the death of a man is no more the result of an arbitrary power than the rise and fall of a tree. Nor is it mere chance. There is no such thing as chance. It is unthinkable that chaos rules the world. Every situation, every condition is a sequel to a previous situation and a previous condition. We resort to the word 'chance' when we do not know the cause.

Sufficient has been said for us to know that in Kamma we find the root cause of death. We also know that no arbitrary power fashions this Kamma according to its will or caprice. It is in the result of our own actions. "//Yadisam vapate bijam tadisam harate phalam//" -- as we sow, so shall we reap. Kamma is not something generated in the closed box of the past. It is always in the making. We are by our actions, every moment contributing to it. Hence, the future is not all conditioned by the past. The present is also conditioning it.

If you fear death, why not make the wisest use of the present so as to ensure a happy future? To fear death on the one hand and on the other, not to act in a way that would ensure a happy future, is either madness or mental lethargy. He who leads a virtuous life, harming none and helping whom he can, in conformity with the Dhamma, always remembering the Dhamma, is without doubt laying the foundation of a happy future life. "//Dhammo have rakkhati dhamma carim//" -- The Dhamma most assuredly protects him who lives in conformity with it. Such conformity is facilitated by the contemplation of death. Death has no fears for one who is thus protected by Dhamma. Then shall he, cheerful and unafraid, be able to face the phenomenon of death with fortitude and calm.

III

ANOTHER approach to the understanding of death is through an understanding of the law of aggregates or Sankharas which states that everything is a combination of things and does not exist by itself as an independent entity. "Sankhara" is a Pali term used for an aggregation, a combination, or an assemblage. The word, is derived from the prefix //San// meaning "together" and the root //kar// meaning "to make." The two together mean "made together" or "constructed together" or "combined together". "All things in this world," says the Buddha, "are aggregates or combinations." That is to say, they do not exist by themselves, but are composed of several things. Any one thing, be it a mighty mountain or a minute mustard seed, is a combination of several things. These things are themselves combinations of several other things. Nothing is a unity, nothing is an entity, large or small. Neither is the sun nor moon an entity, nor is the smallest grain of sand an entity. Each of them is a Sankhara, a combination of several things.

Things seem to be entities owing to the fallibility of our senses -- our faculties of sight, hearing, touching, smelling and tasting, and even thinking. Science has accepted the position that our senses are not infallible guides to us. A permanent entity is only a concept, only a name. It does not exist in reality. In the famous dialogues between King Milinda and Thera Nagasena, the latter wishing to explain to the King this law of aggregates, enquired from the King how he came there, whether on foot or riding. The King replied that he came in a chariot.

> "Your Majesty," said Nagasena, "if you came in a chariot, declare to me the chariot. Is the pole the chariot?" "Truly not," said the King. "Is the axle the chariot," asked Nagasena. "Truly not," said the King. "Is the chariot-body the chariot?" -- "Truly not," said the King. "Is the yoke the chariot?" -- "Truly not," said the King. "Are the reins the chariot?" -- "Truly not," said the King. "Is the goading stick the chariot?" -- "Truly not," said the King.

"Where then, Oh King," asked nagasena, "is this chariot in which you say you came? You are a mighty king of all the continent of India and yet speak a lie when you say there is no chariot."

In this way by sheer analysis, by breaking up what is signified by chariot into its various component parts, Nagasena was able to convince the King that a chariot as such does not exist, but only component parts exist. So much so that the King was able to answer thus, -- "Venerable Nagasena, I speak no lie. The word 'chariot' is but a figure of speech, a term, an appellation, a convenient designation for pole, axle, wheels, chariot-body and banner staff."

Similarly, "human being", "man", "I" are mere names and terms, not corresponding to anything that is really and actually existing. In the ultimate sense there exist only changing energies. The term "Sankhara" however refers not only to matter and properties of matter known as "corporeality" (//rupa//), but also to mind and properties of mind known as "mentality" (//nama//). Hence, the mind is as much a combination or aggregate as the body.

When it is said the mind is a combination of several thoughts, it is not meant that these several thoughts exist together simultaneously as do the different parts of the chariot. What is meant is a succession of thoughts, an unending sequence of thoughts, now a thought of hatred, thereafter a thought of sorrow, thereafter a thought of duty near at hand and thereafter again the original thought of hatred etc., etc., in endless succession. Each thought arises, stays a while and passes on. The three stages of being are found here also -- //uppada, thiti, bhanga// -- arising, remaining and passing away. Thoughts arise, one following the other with such a rapidity of succession that the illusion of a permanent thing called "the mind" is created; but really there is no permanent thing but only a flow of thoughts. The rapid succession of thoughts is compared to the flow of water in a river (//nadi soto viya//), one drop following another in rapid succession that we seem to see a permanent entity in this flow. But this is an illusion. Similarly, there is no such permanent entity as the mind. It is only a succession of thoughts, a stream of thoughts that arise and pass away. If I say that I crossed a river this morning and recrossed it in the evening, is my statement true as regards what I crossed and what I recrossed? Was it what I crossed in the morning that I crossed in the evening? Is it not one set of waters that I crossed in the morning, and a different set of waters that I crossed in the evening? Which of the two is the river, or are there two rivers, a morning river and an evening river? Had I recrossed at mid-day, then there would also be a mid-day river. Asking oneself such questions one would see that every hour, every minute it is a different river. Where then is a permanent thing called 'river'? Is it the river bed or the banks? You will now realize that there is nothing to which you can point out and say, "This is the river." "River" exists only as a name. It is a convenient and conventional mode of expression (//vohara vacana//) for a continuous unending flow of drops of water. Just such is the mind. It is a continuous stream of thoughts. Can you point to any one thought that is passing through the mind and say, "This truly is my mind, my permanent mind?" A thought of anger towards a person may arise in me. If that thought is my permanent mind how comes it that on a later occasion a thought of love towards the same person can arise in me? If that too is my permanent mind, then there are two opposing permanent minds. Questioning on these lines one comes to the inevitable conclusion that there is no such thing as a permanent mind; it is only a convenient expression (//vohara vacana//) for an incessant and variegated stream of thoughts that arise and pass away. "Mind" does not exist in reality. It exists only in name as an expression for a succession of thoughts. Chariot -- river -- body and mind -- these are all combinations. By themselves and apart from these combinations they do not exist. There is nothing intrinsically stable in them, nothing corresponding to reality, nothing permanent, no eternally abiding substratum or soul.

Thus if body is only a name for a combination of changing factors and the mind is likewise only a name for a succession of thoughts, the psycho-physical combination called "man" is not an entity except by way of conventional speech. So when we say a chariot moves or a man walks it is correct only figuratively or conventionally. Actually and really, in the ultimate sense there is only a movement, there is only a walking. Hence has it been said in the //Visuddhi Magga//:

> "There is no doer but the deed
> There is no experiencer but the > experience.
> Constituent parts alone roll on.
> This is the true and correct view."

Now, how does this cold and relentless analysis of mind and body become relevant to the question of death? The relevancy is just this. When analysis reveals that there is no person but only a process, that there is no doer but only a deed, we arrive at the conclusion that there is no person who dies, but that there is only a process of dying. Moving is a process, walking is a process, so dying is also a process. Just as there is no hidden agent back and behind the process of moving or walking, so, there is no hidden agent back and behind the process of dying. If only we are capable of keeping more and more to this abhidhammic view of things, we will be less and less attached to things, we will be less and less committing the folly of identifying ourselves with our actions. Thus shall we gradually arrive at a stage when we grasp the view, so difficult to comprehend, that all life is just a process. It is one of the grandest realizations that can descend on deluded man. It is so illuminating, so enlightening. It is indeed a revelation. With the appearance of that realization there is a disappearance of all worries and fears regarding death. That is a logical sequence. Just as with the appearance of light darkness must disappear, even so the light of knowledge dispels the darkness of ignorance, fear and worry. With realization, with knowledge, these fears and worries will be shown as being empty and unfounded. It is so very easy to keep on declaring this. What is difficult is to comprehend this. Why is it so difficult? Because we are so accustomed to thinking in a groove, because we are so accustomed to overlook the fallacies in our thinking, because we are so accustomed to wrong landmarks and wrong routes in our mental journeying, we are reluctant to cut out a new path. It is we who deny ourselves the benefits of //Samma Ditthi// (Right views) The inveterate habit of identifying ourselves with our actions is the breeding ground of that inviting belief that there is some subtle "ego" back and behind all our actions and thoughts. This is the arch mischief maker that misleads us. We fail to realize that the ego-feeling within us is nothing more than the plain and simple stream of consciousness that is changing always and is never the same for two consecutive moments. As Professor James said, "The thoughts themselves are the thinkers." In our ignorance we hug the belief that this ego-consciousness is the indication of the presence of some subtle elusive soul. It is just the mind's reaction to objects. When we walk we fail to realize that it is just the process of walking and nothing else. We hug the fallacy that there is something within us that directs the walking. When we think, we hug the fallacy that there is something within us that thinks. We fail to realize that it is just the process of thinking and nothing else. Nothing short of profound meditation on the lines indicated in the //Satipatthana Sutta// can cure us of our "//miccha ditthi//" (false belief). The day we are able by such meditation to rid ourselves of these cherished false beliefs against which the Buddha has warned us times without number, beliefs which warp our judgment and cloud our vision of things, shall we be able to develop that clarity of vision which alone can show us things as they actually are. Then only will the realization dawn on us that there is no one who suffers dying, but there is only a dying process just as much as living is also a process. If one can train himself to reflect on these lines, it must necessarily mean that he is gradually giving up the undesirable and inveterate habit of identifying himself with his bodily and mental processes and that he is gradually replacing that habit by a frequent contemplation on //Anatta// (//N'etan mama//, this does not belong to me). Such contemplation will result in a gradual relaxation of our tight grip on our "fond ego". When one thus ceases to hug the ego-delusion, the stage is reached when there is complete detachment of the mind from such allurements. Then shall one be able, cheerful and unafraid, to face the phenomenon of death with fortitude and calm.

IV

WE have seen how reflections on the great law of Kamma and the great law of Aggregates or Sankharas can assist us to form a correct view of death and help us to face death in the correct attitude. Now there is a third great law, a knowledge of which can assist us in the same way, namely, the law of change or //Anicca//. It is the principle behind the first noble truth, the truth of //Dukkha// or Disharmony. It is precisely because there is change or lack of permanency in anything and everything in this world, that there is suffering or disharmony in this world. This principle of change is expressed by the well known formula //Anicca vata sankhara// -- "all sankharas are impermanent." Nothing in this world is stable or static. Time moves everything whether we like it or not. Time moves us also whether we like it or not. Nothing in this world can arrest the ceaseless passage of time and nothing survives time. There is no stability anywhere. Change rules the world. Everything mental and physical is therefore transitory and changing. The change may be quick or the change may be perceptible or it may be imperceptible. We live in an ever changing world, while we ourselves are also all the while changing.

A //sankhara//, we have learnt, is a combination of several factors. These factors are also subject to the law of change. They are changing factors. Hence a Sankhara is not merely a combination of several factors. It is a changing combination of changing factors, since the combination itself is changing. It is because there is change that there is growth. It is because there is change that there is decay. Growth also leads to decay because there is change. Why do flowers bloom only to fade? It is because of the operation of the law of change. It is this law that makes the strength of youth give way to the weakness of old age. It is on account of the operation of the law that though great buildings are erected, towering towards the sky, some distant day will see them totter and tumble. It is this aspect of the law of change, the process of disintegration, that causes colour to fade, iron to rust, and timber to rot. It is such reflections that must have led the poet Gray, contemplating a burial ground in a country church yard, to say,

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
All that beauty, all that wealth ever gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour.
The path of glory leads to the grave."

Sometimes the working of this law is not apparent. Even that which looks so solid and substantial as a rocky mountain will not always remain as such. Science tells us, that maybe after thousands of years, it will wear down by the process of disintegration, and that where a lake now is, a mountain once was. If things arise they must fall, //Uppajjitva nirujjhanti//, says the Buddha -- "having arisen, they fall." Aeons and aeons ago the earth and the moon were one. Today, while the earth is still warm and alive, the moon is cold and dead. The earth too, science tells us, is very slowly, but surely losing its heat and water. Gradually and slowly it is cooling down. Aeons and aeons hence it will cease to support life. It will be a cold and lifeless planet. It will be a second moon. This is just one of several instances where the mighty law of change works imperceptibly. The Buddha also has foretold the end of the earth.

Just as the law of change can cause decline and decay it can also cause growth and progress. Hence it is that a seed becomes a plant and a plant becomes a tree, and a bud becomes a flower. But again there is no permanency in growth. Growth again gives way to decay. The plant must die. The flower must wither. It is an unending cycle of birth and death, integration and disintegration, of rise and fall. Hence it is that Shelley has aptly said,

"Worlds on worlds are rolling over from creation to decay,
Like bubbles on a river, sparkling, bursting, borne away."

It is no arbitrary power that brings about these changes, progressive and retrogressive. The tendency to change is inherent in all things. The law of change does not merely declare that things change but also declares that change is of the very essence of the things. Think of anything, and you will find it to be a mode of change and a condition of change. Change (//aniccata//) is the working hypothesis of the scientist. One of the mightiest tasks of the scientist, also his proudest boast, was to destroy the idea of stability and fixity in the organic world. We have heard of the supposed entity of the atom being shown up as a combination of energies. While science has applied the law of change to the physical domain to split up unity into diversity, the Buddha has applied the self-same law to the entire mind-body complex and split up the seeming unity of being into the five aggregates known as "//Pancakkhandha"//. The Buddha has gone further and explained why this aggregate is temporary, why it should some day disintegrate and why a fresh integration should arise upon the disintegration. Everything works upon a triple principle of //Uppada, Thiti and Bhanga// -- arising, remaining and passing away. Even in the case of a thought these three stages are present.

When the Buddha dealt with the four chief elements of the world of matter and showed that they too are subject to the great law of change, he proceeded to show that the human body which is also formed of the same elements must necessarily be subject to the same great law of change. "What then of this fathom-long body" asked the Buddha. "Is there anything here of which it may rightly be said, 'I' or 'mine' or 'am'? Nay verily nothing whatsoever."

The sooner one appreciates the working of this law of change, the more will he be able to profit by it, attuning himself to that way of living, that way of thinking and speaking and acting, where this law will work to his best advantage. The man who knows the subtle working of this law of change, will also know how "//nama//" (mentality) can change by purposeful action. However deeply he gets involved in evil, he will not regard evil as a permanent obstruction because he knows that the evil mind can also change, He knows that by constant contemplation on what is good, good thoughts tend to arise in the mind. The constant contemplation of good will cause //Kusala Sankharas// (good tendencies) to arise in the mind and these //kusala Sankharas// will dislodge the //Akusala Sankharas// (evil tendencies) -- a process which hitherto appeared to him to be impossible. When his thoughts and tendencies change for the better, when his mind is permeated thus with good tendencies, his speech and deeds automatically change for the better -- a pleasant surprise for him. With purer and purer conduct (//sila//) thus acquired, deeper and deeper concentration (//samadhi//) is possible. Increased power to concentrate accelerates the pace towards the achievement of that Highest Wisdom known as //Panna//. Thus the bad in him changes into good. A bad man changes into a good man. By purposeful action the law of change is made to operate to his highest benefit. He now becomes a good man in the truest sense of the word. The good man is always a happy man. He has no fear of death because he has no fear of the life beyond. Of such a man has it been said in the Dhammapada:

> "The doer of good rejoices in this world.
> He rejoices in the next world.
> He rejoices in both worlds."

The powerful change brought about in his life will ensure upon its dissolution, the birth of a more fortunate being -- a result which he can confidently expect at his dying moment. Not for him then are the fears and terrors of death. Furthermore when one follows minutely the working of the Law of Change in respect of one's own body and mind and also in respect of another's body and mind, one begins to acquire so close a familiarity with change that death will not appear as just one more example of the process of change to which one has been subject all along since birth. It will appear as something to be expected, something that must occur to fit in with what had occurred earlier. To one who can thus reflect on death, there is nothing to fear. Cheerful and unafraid, he can face the phenomenon of death with fortitude and calm.

THERE is another angle from which we can study death and that is from the angle of law of conditionality which is closely akin to the law of //Anicca// or Change. Not only are //Sankharas// made up of several things but they are also conditioned by several factors, and when these conditioning factors cease to exist, the conditioned thing also ceases to exist. This is the law of conditionality and has been thus expressed in very general terms: //Imasmim sati, idam hoti// -- when this exists, that exists, //Imassa uppada ,idam uppajjati// -- when this arises, that arises. //Imasmim asati, idam na hoti// -- when this is not, that is not. //Imassa nirodha, idam nirujjhanti// -- when this ceases that ceases. As this principle is of universal applicability, the working of the process of life and death also comes within its operation. The chain of life-conditioning factors consists of twelve links or //Nidanas// which together are known as the //Paticca Samuppada// or Law of Dependent Origination. A knowledge of this law is most necessary. In the //Maha Nidana Sutta// of the //Digha Nikaya//, Buddha addressing Ananda said, "It is through not understanding, through not penetrating this doctrine, that these beings have become entangled like a ball of thread."

The formula of Dependent Origination runs as follows:

Conditioned by ignorance, activities arise.
Conditioned by activities, consciousness arises.
Conditioned by consciousness, mentality and corporeality arise.
Conditioned by mentality and corporeality, the six faculties arise.
Conditioned by the six faculties, contact arises.
Conditioned by contact, sensation arises.
Conditioned by sensation, craving arises.
Conditioned by craving, grasping arises.
Conditioned by grasping, becoming arises.
Conditioned by becoming, rebirth arises.
Conditioned by re-birth, old age and death arise.

This is the process that goes on and on //ad infinitum//. Hence has it been said:

"Again and again the slow wits seek re-birth,
Again and again comes birth and dying comes,
Again and again men bear us to the grave."

This important law is easier told than understood. This is one of the profoundest doctrines preached by the Buddha. It is only frequent and hard thinking on it that will bring out its deepest meanings. This is not the place to explain these twelve links in full, but in order to dispel some of the misconception surrounding the notion of death, it is necessary to make some observations on the first link -- //Avijja//, or Ignorance, and thereafter on the second and third links, //viz.// activities and consciousness, because it is these two links that involve death and re-birth.

These twelve links, it must be understood, do not represent a pure succession of cause and effect, a straight line of action and reaction. It is wrong to call this a causal series, as it is not a chain of causes in strict sequence of time. Some of the links (though not all) arise simultaneously, and the next is of condition rather than cause. There are 24 modes of conditioning (//paccaya//) which may operate in the relation of one factor to another. Each factor is both conditioning (//paccaya dhamma//) and conditioned (//paccayuppanna dhamma//). Many of these factors are both simultaneously and interdependently working.

A few observations now, on the first link of //Avijja// or ignorance. When it is said the Ignorance is the first link, it does not mean that Ignorance is the first cause of existence. The Buddha has definitely said that the first cause, the ultimate origin of things is unthinkable, //Anamataggayam sansaro, pubba-koit na pannayati//, "Beginningless, O monks, is this course of existence. A starting point is not to be found." Bertrand Russell has stated, "There is no reason to suppose that this world had a beginning at all. The idea that things must have a beginning is really due to the poverty of our imagination." Ignorance, then, is not the primary origin of things but is the originating factor of suffering in the process of life and death, so far as man is concerned. All the twelve factors are continuing factors. It is only if we ponder deeply that we will be convinced of this truth, namely, that there can be no beginning to a process that has no end.

What is meant by Ignorance as being the first link in the series? By Ignorance is here meant the Ignorance of the essentially fundamental facts of existence, namely, the fact of suffering or disharmony, the fact of the cessation of suffering or disharmony, and the fact of the way leading to the cessation of suffering or disharmony. In other words, it is the ignorance of that which the Buddha has called the Four Noble Truths. Ignorance is always a dangerous condition. In such a condition you are at the mercy of everyone and everything.

'"Tis Ignorance that entails the dreary round
Now here now there -- of countless births and deaths.
But no hereafter waits for him who knows."

The second link is Activities. By Activities is here meant volitional activities, called in Pali //Sankhara//. The formula states -- "Dependent upon Ignorance arise activities." This means that ignorance of the essentially fundamental facts of life becomes a conditioning factor for the volitional activities of man. It is only a knowledge and a realization of the Four Noble Truths that, according to the Buddha, enables a man to see things as they actually are. In the state of ignorance of these Truths man, prevented as he is from seeing things as they actually are, adopts various courses of action. These activities are not merely the outcome of ignorance once and for all, but ignorance continues to condition these volitional activities so long as existence continues. These volitional activities or mental energies are multifarious. In the context of the //Paticca Samuppada//, "//Sankhara//" can therefore be said to signify "//Kamma//" or "Kammic Volition". The first link of Ignorance and the second link of Activities refer to the past birth. The next eight links refer to the present existence and the last two refer to the future existence.

The third link is //Vinnana// or Consciousness. The formula states -- "Dependent upon Activities arises Consciousness." By consciousness is here meant re-linking consciousness or re-birth consciousness. By this formula is therefore meant that the conscious life of man in his present birth is conditioned by his volitional activities, his good and bad actions, his Kamma of the past life. To put it in another way, the consciousness of his present life is dependent on his past Kamma. This formula is highly important since it involves a linking of the past life with the present and thereby implies re-birth. Hence, this third link is called //patisandhi vinnana// or re-linking consciousness or re-birth consciousness.

It may be wondered how activities of the past life can condition a present birth. Material sciences seek to explain birth on the premises of the present existence only. The biologist says that it is the union of father with mother that conditions birth. According to the Buddha, these two conditioning factors by themselves are insufficient to result in birth, otherwise every complete union of father with mother should result in birth. These two are purely physical factors and it is illogical to expect that a psycho-physical organism, a mind-body combination known as man could arise from two purely physical factors without the intervention of a psychical or mental factor. Therefore, says the Buddha, a third factor is also necessary in addition to the two purely physical factors of the sperm and the ovum.

This third factor is //patisandhi-vinnana// or re-linking consciousness. The wick and the oil will not alone produce a flame. You may drown a wick in gallons of oil but there will never be a flame. You may use a wick of the most inflammable type but there will never be a flame. Not until a bright spark of light comes from elsewhere will the action of the oil and the wick produce a flame. We have considered that the activities of the past are certain energies -- mental energies. The Kamma of the past releases these energies which are potent enough to create the condition for the being to be reborn in an appropriate place according to the nature of activities performed. These energies it is that produce the //patisandhi vinnana//, the third factor. It will thus be seen that these potential energies work in co- operation with the physical laws to condition the natural formation of the embryo in the mother's womb. Just as sleep is no bar to the continuance of bodily operations in consequence of the principle of life continuing within it, even so death is no bar to the continuance of the operation of being which is only transformed to another suitable realm or plane there to be reborn and to re-live, in consequence of the will-to-live remaining alive and unabated at the moment of dissolution. The life-stream, the process of being thus continues, while the Kammic forces it generates give it shape and form in the appropriate sphere of existence, investing it with its new characteristics and securing for it "a local habitation and a name". A seed coming in contact with the soil produces a plant, but the plant is not born of the seed and the soil only. There are other factors drawn from unseen extraneous sources that come into play, such as light and air and moisture. It is the combined presence of all these factors that provide the opportunity for the birth of the plant. The unseen extraneous factor where the birth of a being is concerned is the terminating kammic energy of the dying man, or to express it in another way, the reproductive power of the will-to-live.

Is there any need to doubt the potency of the past Kamma to create a present existence? Do you doubt that the activities of one existence can condition consciousness in another existence? If so, calmly reflect on the incessant and multifarious nature of human activities, the one feature of human life, the unfailing characteristic of every moment of individual existence. When you have sufficiently grasped the fact of the incessant and multifarious nature of human activities, ask yourself the question who or what propels these activities? A little reflection will reveal that the activities of man are propelled by a myriad of desires and cravings which ultimately spring from the desire to live. This will-to-live by whatever name you may call it, motivates all activities. We eat, we earn, we acquire, we struggle, we advance, we hate, we love, we plot, we plan, we deceive -- all in order that we may continue living. Even the desire to commit suicide, paradoxical as it may seem, arises from the desire to live -- to live free from entanglements and disappointments. Just consider the cumulative effect of hundreds of desire-propelled activities performed by us, day by day, hour by hour, minute by minute for a long period of years. These are all Kammas, these are all energies released. These are all strong creative forces that are generated.

It is difficult to imagine that with the present life will end all the desire-forces it has brought into existence. There will always be at any given moment an outstanding balance of unexpected Kammic energies. These powers, energies or forces contain within themselves the potentialities of attracting for themselves the conditions for further existence. These energies or forces are potent enough to create the conditions for re-living when the body which sustained these forces ceases to live. These then will constitute the terminating Kammic energy of the dying man, or to express the same idea in another way, this is the reproductive power of the will-to-live. In short, the will-to-live makes it possible to re-live.

Now we see how the terminating Kammic energy of the dying man becomes the third factor, the psychical factor which along with the two physical factors of the sperm and the ovum, conditions future birth. It is this relinking consciousness that becomes the nucleus of a new //nama-rupa// or mind-body combination. This is the resultant terminal energy generated by the volitional activities of the past. Science teaches us that energy is indestructible but that it can be transmuted into other forms of energy. Why then cannot these powerful energies of the past Kamma, impelled as they are by the pulsation of craving and motivated as they are by the will-to-live, continue to exert their potent influences albeit in some other manner and in some other sphere? What is it that travels from one existence to another, you may ask. Do activities (Kammic energies) travel or do their resultant forces travel? Or does consciousness itself travel? The answer is an emphatic, "No". None of these travel, but the Kammic energy of actions performed is a tremendous force or power which can make its influence felt and to effect this influence, distance is no bar. Distance is never a bar to Kammic energies making themselves felt. In the //Maha-Tanha-Sankhaya Sutta of Majjhima Nikaya//, the Buddha's teachings that //Vinnana// or consciousness travels from existence to existence. "Foolish man," said the Buddha, "has not consciousness generated by conditions been spoken of in many a figure of speech by me saying, 'apart from conditions there is no origination of consciousness'?" No physical contact is necessary for mind to influence matter. Sir William Crooke, in his Edinburgh lectures on mental science has said, "It has also been proved by experiment that by an act of will the mind can cause objects such as metal levers to move." When the matter on which mental energies act is situated far away, in other planes and spheres of existence, we are only employing a figure of speech when we say that Kamma has traveled or that energy has traveled. Many a simile has been employed by the Buddha to show that nothing travels or transmigrates from one life to another. It is just a process of one condition influencing another. The resultant Kammic energies of human activity, not yet expanded, are so powerful that they can condition the formation of an embryo in another world and give it consciousness.

One important point must not be overlooked. The //Patisandhi-vinnana// or re-linking consciousness arises only in the unborn child. In the pre-natal stage the re-linking consciousness may be said to exist only passively (in the //bhavanga// state) and not actively, since the child is still part of the body of the mother and has no separate, independent existence nor does it contact the external world. When however, the child is born and assumes a separate existence and begins to contact the external world, then it may be said that the //bhavanga// nature of the pre-natal state of mind gives way for the first time to a fully conscious mind process, the //Vithi-citta//.

Distance is no bar to the sequence of cause and effect. Reference had already been made to the Buddha's reprimand of a bhikkhu called Sati for declaring as having been taught by the Buddha that consciousness passes from existence to existence. In the re-linking consciousness arises the whole energy of the previous consciousness, and thus the embryo while inheriting the characteristics of the new parents inherits also the impressions of the past experiences of the dying man. How else can one explain characteristics not accounted for by heredity? How else can one account for different characteristics in twins born of the same parents and growing under the same environment?

We have now studied death from several angles. From whatever angle we look at death it is an integral part of the great process of life. Death is like the break up of an electric bulb. The light is extinguished but not the current, and when a fresh bulb is fixed the light re-appears. Similarly there is a continuity of life current, the break up of the present body does not extinguish the current of Kammic energy which will manifest itself in an appropriate fresh body. The simile is not on all fours with life. Whereas there is nothing to bring the electric current and the fresh bulb together (a conjunction left to chance), the type of life led, the nature of thought entertained, the quality of deeds performed will be strong enough to cause an immediate relinking consciousness of like nature to arise, on the principle that like attracts like. Thus the dying man is drawn to an environment, good or bad, which he has created for himself by his thought, word and deed, for on these depend the nature of our future life. Every moment we are creating our future. Every moment then we must be careful.

If we can visualize the immensity of the past and the immensity of the future, the present loses its seemingly compelling importance. If we could but visualize the vistas of innumerable births and deaths through which we will pass in the future, we should not, we could not fear just this one death out of the endless series of birth and deaths, rises and falls, appearances and disappearances which constitute the ceaseless process of samsaric life.

VI

THERE is yet another law the understanding of which helps in the understanding of death. It is the Law of Becoming or //Bhava//, which is a corollary to the Law of Change or //Anicca//. Becoming, or //Bhava//, is also one of the factors in the scheme of Dependent Origination. According to Buddhism the Law of Becoming, like the Law of Change, is constantly at work and applies to everything. While the Law of Change states that nothing is permanent but is ever-changing, the Law of Becoming states that everything is always in the process of changing into something else. Not only is everything changing, but the nature of that change is a process of becoming something else. Not only is everything changing, but the nature of that change is a process of becoming something else, however short or long the process may be. Briefly put, the Law of Becoming is this: "Nothing is, but is becoming." A ceaseless becoming is the feature of all things. A small plant is always in the process of becoming an old tree. There is no point of time at which anything is not becoming something else. Rhys Davids in his American lectures has said, "In every case as soon as there is a beginning, there begins also at that moment to be an ending."

If you stand by the sea and watch how wave upon wave rises and falls, one wave merging into the next, one wave becoming another, you will appreciate that this entire world is also just that -- becoming and becoming. If you can stand by a bud continuously until it becomes a flower, you will be amazed to see that the condition of the bud at one moment appears to be no different from its condition at the next moment and so on, until before your very eyes, the change has taken place through you could not discern it at all. The process is so gradual, one stage merging into the next so imperceptibly. It is a becoming. If you close your eyes to this process, if you see the bud one day and then see it a day later, then only will you see a change. Then only will you speak in the terms of "buds" and "flowers" and not in terms of a process of a becoming.

If you can keep on looking at a new-born babe without a break for ten years you will not perceive any change. The baby born at 10 a.m. appears just the same at 11 a.m. or at 12 noon. Each moment shows no difference from the next. One condition merges into the next so imperceptibly. It is a becoming, a continuous process of becoming. Close your eyes to this process and see the baby once a month. then only will you perceive a change. Then only can you speak in terms of "baby" and "boy" and not in terms of a process or a becoming.

If you think you can watch minutely the progress of time, see whether you can divide it into present, past, and future as do grammarians speaking of present tense, past tense and future tense. In the view of Buddhist philosophy, time is one continuous process, each fragmentary portion of time merging into the other and forming such an unbroken continuity that no dividing line can precisely be drawn separating past time from present, or present time from future. The moment you think of the present and say to yourself "this moment is present time" it is gone -- vanished into the past before you can even complete your sentence. The present is always slipping into the past, becoming the past, and the future is always becoming the present. Everything is becoming. This is a universal process, a constant flux. It is when we miss the continuity of action that we speak in terms of things rather than processes or becomings.

Biology says that the human body undergoes a continual change, all the cells composing the body being replaced every seven years. According to Buddhism, changes in the body are taking place every moment. At no two consecutive moments is the body the same. In the last analysis, it is a stream of atoms or units of matter of different types which are every moment arising and passing away. The body is thus constantly dying and re-living within this existence itself. This momentary death (//Khanika marana//) takes place every moment of our existence.

In the //Visuddhi Magga// it is said that in the ultimate sense, the life span of living beings is extremely short, being only as much as the duration of a single conscious moment. "Just as a chariot wheel" continues the //Visuddhi Magga// "when it is rolling, touches the ground at one point only of the circumference of its tire, so too the life of living beings lasts only for a single conscious moment. When that consciousness has ceased, the being is said to have ceased." Thus we see that every moment of our lives we are dying and being reborn. This being so why should we dread just one particular moment of death, the moment that marks the end of this existence? When there are innumerable moments of death, why fear the occurrence of one particular moment? Ignorance of the momentary nature of death makes us fearful of the particular death that takes place at the last moment of existence here, especially as the next moment of living is not seen nor understood. The last moment in this existence is just one of the innumerable moments of death that will follow it.

It is not life in this existence only that is a process of becoming. The process of becoming continues into the next existence also, because there is a continuity of consciousness. The last consciousness (//cuti-citta//) in one life is followed by what is known as a re-linking consciousness (//patisandhi- vinnana//) in the next life. The process of one consciousness giving rise to another continues unbroken, the only difference being a change in the place where such consciousness manifests itself. Distance is no bar to the sequence of cause and effect. Life is a process of grasping and becoming, and death is a change of the thing grasped leading to a new becoming. Grasping is a continuous feature where human living is concerned. It is this grasping that leads to becoming. What causes grasping? Where there is thirst, there is grasping. It is this thirst, this desire, this craving, this will-to-live, this urge which is known as //Tanha// that causes grasping. The Kammic energy resulting from this //Tanha// is like fire. It always keeps on burning and is always in search of fresh material upon which it can sustain itself. It is ever in search of fresh conditions for its continued existence. At the moment of the dissolution of the body, that unexpected desire-energy, that residuum of Kamma, grasps fresh fuel and seeks a fresh habitation where it can sustain itself. Thus proceeds the continuous flux of grasping and becoming which is life.

Let us now examine the unduly dreaded dying moment which marks the end of man's present existence, only to commence another. The physical condition of any dying man is so weak that the volitional control by the mind at the dying moment lacks the power to choose its own thoughts. This being so, the memory of some powerfully impressive and important event of the dying man's present existence (or his past existence) will force itself upon the threshold of his mind, the forcible entry of which thought he is powerless to resist. This thought which is known as the //maranasanna-javana// thought and precedes the //cuti-citta// or terminal thought, can be one of three types. Firstly, it can be the thought of some powerfully impressive act done (//kamma//) which the dying man now recalls to mind. Secondly, the powerfully impressive act of the past can be recalled by way of a symbol of that act (//Kamma nimitta//) as, for instance, if he had stolen money from a safe, he may see the safe. Thirdly, the powerfully impressive act of the past may be recalled by way of a sign or indication of the place where he is destined to be re-born by reason of such act, as for instance when a man who has done great charitable acts hears beautiful divine music. This is called //Gati nimitta// or the sign of destination. It is symbolic of his place of re-birth. These three types of thought-objects which he cannot consciously choose for himself, are known as death signs and any one of them as the case may be, will very strongly and vividly appear to the consciousness of the dying man. Then follows the //cuti citta// or terminal thought or death consciousness. This last thought series is most important since it fashions the nature of his next existence, just as the last thought before going to sleep can become the first thought on awakening. No extraneous or arbitrary power does this for him. He does this for himself unconsciously as it were. The most important act of his life it is, good or bad, that conditions the last thought moment of a life. The kamma of this action is called //Garuka kamma// or weighty Kamma. In the majority of cases the type of act which men habitually perform and for which they have the strongest liking becomes the last active thought. The ruling thought in life becomes strong at death. This habitual kamma is called //Acinna Kamma//.

The idea of getting a dying man to offer cloth (//Pamsukula//) to the Sangha or the idea of chanting sacred texts to him is in order to help him to obtain a good terminal thought for himself by way of //Asanna Kamma// or death-proximate Kamma, but the powerful force of inveterate habit can supervene and in spite of the chantings by the most pious monks available, the memory of bad deeds repeatedly performed may surge up to his consciousness and become the terminal thought.

The reverse can also occur. If the last few acts and thoughts of a person about to die are powerfully bad, however good he had been earlier, then his terminal thought may be so powerfully bad that it may prevent the habitually good thought from surging up to his consciousness, as is said to have happened in the case of Queen Mallika, the wife of King Pasenadi of Kosala. She lived a life full of good deeds but at the dying moment what came to her mind was the thought of a solitary bad deed done. As a result she was born in a state of misery where she suffered, but it was only for seven days. The effects of the good Kamma were suspended only temporarily.

There is a fourth type of Kamma that can cause the terminal thought to arise. This last type prevails when any of the foregoing three types of Kamma is not present. In that event one of the accumulated reserves of the endless past is drawn out. This is called //Katatta Kamma// or stored-up Kamma. Once the terminal thought arises, then follows the process of thought moments lawfully linked with it. This terminal thought process is called //maranasanna javana vithi//. The terminal thought goes through the same stages of progress as any other thought, with this differences that whereas the apperceptive stage of complete cognition known as //Javana// or impulsion, which in the case of any other thought occupies seven thought-moments. At this apperceptive stage the dying person fully comprehends the death- sign. Then follows the stage of registering consciousness (//tadalambana//) when the death-sign is identified. This consciousness arises for two thought-moments and passes away. After this comes the stage of death consciousness (//cuti citta//). Then occurs death. This is what happens in this existence.

Now let us consider what happens in the next existence. Already the preliminaries for the arrival of a new being are in preparation. There is the male parent and there is the female parent. As explained previously a third factor, a psychic factor, is necessary to complete the preliminaries for the arising of a live embryo, and that is the relinking consciousness (//Patisandi-Vinnana//) which arises in the next existence in the appropriate setting -- the mother's womb. On the conjunction of these three factors, life starts in the mother's womb. There is no lapse of time, no stoppage of the unending stream of consciousness. No sooner has the death-consciousness in the dying man passed away than rebirth consciousness arises in some other state of existence. There is nothing that has travelled from this life to the next. Even the terminal thought did not travel. It had the power to give rise to the passive or //bhavanga// state. At the moment of birth which marks a separate existence, through contact with the outer world, the unconscious or sub-conscious //bhavanga// state gives way to the //vithi-citta// or conscious mind. From birth onwards activity again comes into play, propelled by desire in some form or another. So proceeds the onward course of the life-flux, desire-propelled and desire-motivated.

Now what is the relevancy of a knowledge of the law of conditionality to the question of our attitude towards death? Once we thoroughly comprehend the fact that the will to live proceeds from life to life, we come to appreciate the view that this life and the next is but one continuous process. So also the life following and the next thereafter. To one who understands life thus as nothing more nor less than a long continuous process, there is no more reason to grieve at death than at life. They are part of the same process -- the process of grasping, the process of giving effect to the will-to-live. Death is only a change in the thing grasped. The man enriched with the knowledge of the law of conditionality comprehends that birth induces death and death induces birth in the round of sansaric life. He therefore cannot possibly be perturbed at death. To him birth is death and death is birth. An appreciation of the law of conditionality will reveal to him the importance of living his life well and when he has lived his life well, death is the birth of greater opportunities to live a still better life. That is how he regards death.

It all depends on the way one looks at death. Suppose there is only one gate to a house, is that an exit gate or an entrance gate? To one who is on the road side of the gate it is an entrance gate. To the inmate of the house it is an exit gate, but for both of them it is the self-same gate which is thus differently viewed. As Dahlke says, "Dying is nothing but a backward view of life, and birth is nothing but a forward view of death."

In truth, birth and death are phases of an unbroken process of grasping. Death is a departure to those whom the dying man leaves behind. It is also an arrival to the members of the new family into which he is re-born. It is death or birth according to the way we look at it, but we can only be one-way observers. If we observe the death-process, we are not in a position to observe the birth process, and if we observe the birth process, we are not in a position to observe the death process. So, birth and death do not get co-ordinated in our minds as one connected process. By our failure to see the close sequence of the two processes, the co-ordination of birth with death or death with birth, we are led to the illusion, or at least the wish, that we can have the one (birth) without the other (death). We want life but we do not want death. This is an impossibility. Clinging to life is clinging to death. The salient feature of life is clinging-grasping -- and the logical result of clinging according to the law of conditionality is death. If you want to avert death, you have to avert life, you have to reverse the process of conditionality. This can only be done by abandoning the desire to cling, the desire to grasp. Let there be no attachment to life. If you attach yourself unduly to the things of life, happiness you may have for a brief time, but some day when the things to which you have attached yourself disintegrate and disappear as they must, by virtue of that mighty law of change working in conjunction with the equally mighty law of conditionality, then the very objects of joy become objects of sorrow. You will then agree with the poet who said, "Earth's sweetest joy is but pain disguised." As great was the joy of attachment so great will be the sorrow of detachment. Is not this suffering? Is not this wearisome -- one day to pursue a phantom with excitement, next day to abandon it with disgust, one day to be exalted and the next day to be depressed? How long will your sense of self-respect allow you to be thrown up and down this way and that, like a foot-ball? Is it not far more satisfactory, far more dignified, far safer and far wiser to go through life unattached? If misfortune has to come, it will; if sickness has to come, it will. We cannot change the events of life but we can certainly change our attitude towards them. The laws of change and conditionality will help us here. Fears and sorrows will change into hopes and joys. To such a one living a life of calm and peace, viewing life with equanimity, death holds no fears and terrors. Cheerful and unafraid, he can face the phenomenon of death with fortitude and calm.

LET us now consider the cases of two persons who were overpowered with grief at the bereavement they had to suffer. First let us consider the case of //Patacara//. She lost her husband who was bitten by a snake. She was too weak to cross a river with both her children -- a new born babe and a child about one year old. So she left the elder child on the bank and waded through the water with her new-born babe with the greatest difficulty. Having reached the thither shore and having left the new-born babe there, she was returning through the water to reach the elder child. She had hardly reached mid-stream when a hawk swooped down on the new-born babe and carried it away thinking it to be a piece of flesh. When Patacara seeing this cried out in frantic grief raising both her hands, the elder child on the other bank thinking that his mother was calling him, ran into the river and was drowned. Alone, weeping and lamenting, she was proceeding now to her parental home whither she had intended going with her husband and her two children, when one by one these calamities occurred. As she was proceeding she met a man returning from her home town and inquired from him about her parents and her brother. This man gave the dismal news that owing to a severe storm the previous day, her parental house had come down, destroying both her father and her mother and also her brother. As he spoke he pointed to some smoke rising into the air far away and said, "That is the smoke rising from the one funeral pyre in which are burning the bodies of your father, mother and brother." Completely distracted with grief, she ran about like a mad woman regardless of her falling garments. Agony was gnawing at her heart, agony of the most excruciating type. Advised to go to the Buddha, she went and explained her plight. What did the Buddha tell her? "Patacara, be no more troubled. This is not the first time thou hast wept over the loss of a husband. This is not the first time thou hast wept over the loss of parents and of brothers. Just as today, so also through this round of existence thou hast wept over the loss of so many countless husbands, countless sons, countless parents and countless brothers, that the tears thou has shed are more abundant than the waters of the four oceans." As the Buddha spoke these words of wisdom and consolation, Patacara's grief grew less and less intense and finally, not only did her grief leave her altogether, but when the Buddha preached to her and concluded his discourse, Patacara reached the stage of Stream-entry (//Sotapatti//), the first stage of sainthood.

Now what is that contributed to the removal of grief from the mind of Patacara? It is the keen realization of the universality of death. Patacara realized that she had lived innumerable lives, that she had suffered bereavement innumerable times, and that death is something which is always occurring.

While Patacara realized the universality of death by reference to her own numerous bereavements in the past, Kisagotami realized it by reference to the numerous bereavements occurring to others around her in this life itself. When her only child died, her grief was so great that she clung to the dead body, not allowing any one to cremate it. This was the first bereavement she had ever experienced. With the dead child firmly held to her body she went from house to house inquiring for some medicine that would bring back life to her child. She was directed to the Buddha who asked her to procure a pinch of white mustard seed, but it should be from a house where no death had taken place. She then went in search of this supposed cure for her child which she thought was easy to obtain. At the very first house she asked for it but when she inquired whether any death had taken place under that roof she received the reply, "What sayest thou, woman? As for the living, they be few, as for the dead they be many." She then went to the next house. There also she came to know that death had made its visit to that house as well. She went to many houses and in all of them she was told of some father who had died or of some son who had died or of some other relative or friend who had died. When evening came she was tired of her hopeless task. She heard the word "death" echoing from every house. She realized the universality of death. She buried the dead child in the forest, then went back to the Buddha and said, "I thought it was I only who suffered bereavement. I find it in every house. I find that in every village the dead are more in number than the living." Not only was Kisagotami cured of her grief, but at the end of the discourse which the Buddha delivered to her, she too attained the stage of Stream- entry (//Sotapatti//).

Let us now contrast the cases of Patacara and Kisagotami with that of the ignorant rustic farmer the Bodhisatta was in a former life as mentioned in the //Uraga Jataka//. Rustic though he was, he practiced mindfulness on death to perfection. He had trained himself to think every now and then "Death can at any moment come to us." This is something on which the majority of us refuse to do any thinking at all. Not only did he make it a habit to think so, but he even saw to it that all members of his household did the same. One day while he was working with his son in the field, the latter was stung by a snake and died on the spot. The father was not one bit perturbed. He just carried the body to the foot of a tree, covered it with a cloak, neither weeping nor lamenting, and resumed his plowing unconcerned. Later he sent word home, through a passer-by, to send up one parcel of food instead of two for the mid-day meal and to come with perfumes and flowers. When the message was received, his wife knew what it meant but she too did not give way to expressions of grief; neither did her daughter nor her daughter- in-law nor the maid-servant. As requested they all went with perfumes and flowers to the field, and a most simple cremation took place, with no one weeping. Sakka the chief of gods came down to earth and proceeding to the place where a body was burning upon a pile of firewood, inquired from those standing around whether they were roasting the flesh of some animal. When they replied, "It is no enemy but our own son." "Then he could not have been a son dear to you," said Sakka. "He was a very dear son," replied the father. "Then," asked Sakka, "why do you not weep?" The father in reply uttered this stanza:

"Man quits his mortal frame, when joy in life is past.
Even as a snake is wont its worn out slough to cast.
No friends' lament can touch the ashes of the dead.
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread."

Similar questions were asked from the dead son's mother who replied thus:

"Uncalled he hither came, unbidden soon to go.
Even as he came he went, what cause is here for woe?
No friends' lament can touch the ashes of the dead.
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread."

"Sisters surely are loving to their brothers. Why do you not weep?" asked Sakka of the dead man's sister. She replied:

"Though I should fast and weep, how would it profit me?
My kith and kin alas would more unhappy be.
No friends' lament can touch the ashes of the dead.
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread."

Sakka then asked the dead man's wife why she did not weep. She replied thus:

"As children cry in vain to grasp the moon above,
So mortals idly mourn the loss of those they love.
No friends' lament can touch the ashes of the dead.
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread."

Lastly Sakka asked the maid-servant why she did not weep, especially as she had stated that the master was never cruel to her but was most considerate and kind and treated her like a foster child. This was her reply:

"A broken pot of earth, ah, who can piece again?
So too, to mourn the dead is nought but labor vain.
No friends' lament can touch the ashes of the dead.
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread."

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

"A noble man asked Master Hakuin: 'what happens to the enlightened man at death? What happens to the unenlightened man?' The master replied: 'Why ask me?' 'Because you are a Zen master!' 'Yes,' said Hakuin, 'but not a dead one!' "

(from Kapleau, 1971, p60)

The goal of Buddha's teaching is Nibbana (Nirvana). The perpetual cycling of birth, aging, sickness and death is caused by attachment. To develop detachment the Buddha taught about rebirth, kamma (karma), conditionality and encouraged an awareness of death. Buddhists consider that the ego is insubstantial and that only energy moves from moment to moment and lifetime to lifetime. Kamma, or volitional action creates the impulse that impels consciousness to be born into various realms and eventually to death. There are two types of meditation. One centres upon concentration while the other on insight. One can prepare for death by creating wholesome kamma and by being aware of the insubstantiality, impermanence and unsatisfactoriness of conditions. The wise person learns to be aware and surrender to all conditions, death included. One can assist another to have a beneficial death by being honest, trustworthy and restrained with expectations and value judgements, and so be instrumental in creating a conducive environment on both the physical and emotional levels.

The Buddha began teaching about 2500 years ago. He emphasised awareness and detachment in a present time context. The goal of Buddhist meditation is Nibbana (Nirvana). To help realise this he taught about rebirth, kamma (karma), the conditionality of birth and death and encouraged an awareness of death. The moment of death is said to be a sensitive and important time. To facilitate a beneficial death, conditions should be conducive. The living can skilfully prepare for this moment, as well as assist others to make their last moment a wholesome one.

The Teachings

Life and death was considered by the Buddha as a cycle that was perpetuated by craving and attachment. The Buddhist conception of this cycle not only relates to the birth and death of entities, but also relates to every moment of a being's life. "Each moment's consciousness is said to be a product of the fading out and re-arising of a previous moment's consciousness. The present mind is thus a unit born from the death of the last moment's mind." (Mullin, 1986, p18).

The Buddha perceived the dissatisfaction of suffering in the continual cycling and realised that if craving did not arise neither would birth, aging, sickness and death. The goal of the Buddhist is to attain Nibbana (or Nirvana) which is supposed to be unconditioned and therefore free from suffering. To do this the Buddha recommended developing mindfulness, morality, concentration, wisdom and non-attachment and so break the links in the cycle of birth and death.

According to Prof Jayatilleke (Nyanaponika and Walshe, 1971), a materialist considers that nothing precedes birth or follows death. The materialists consider themselves rational yet they deny one of the most basic laws of physics, the conservation of energy.

Rebirth to a Buddhist is not considered as the transmigration of a soul or ego; instead it is like a transference of energy. The life and death processes have been compared to the movement of energy through a line of billiard balls. (Ananda Coomaraswamy according to Kapleau, 1971). If the balls are in a line touching one another and one ball strikes one end of the line it will stop still while the last ball will continue its momentum and move in a similar fashion. Similarly in a sine wave, particles of the wave vibrate vertically yet the wave appears to move horizontally. Likewise Buddhists think that no "thing" is transferred from life to life but a momentum or impulse. "Just as, in the present existence, a preceding becomes the condition for a succeeding mental state, so in dependence on the last thought-moment of one life arises the first thought-moment of the next" (Bhiksu Sangharakshita, according to Kapleau, 1971, pp48-49).

Kamma literally means action or deed (Rajavaramuni, 1974). The theory is that every volitional action leaves an impression or habit that will later act as a subconscious predisposition. The actions that one performs create the momentum for the mind states one experiences throughout life. Kamma therefore affects our mind and personality in the present moment as well as the patterns our life may follow. Mullin (1986) says that there are three types of kamma. Negative (unwholesome) kamma that leads to contracted and unhappy mind states. Positive (wholesome) kamma that leads to expansive happy states of mind and meditative kamma (also wholesome) that leads to liberation. Kamma is not a fatalistic concept, because through intention an individual can create (cause) their mode of existence (result). One does not, therefore, get punished or rewarded from an outside force; whatever suffering there is, instead arises from the habits of attachment, aversion and ignorance, as these tendencies lead to the identification with a 'self' and entanglement in the cycle of birth, aging, sickness and death.

Thus a being is considered as a dynamic continuum of body and mind, in which both conscious and unconscious memories affect the present existence. For most, rebirth is an unproven hypothesis. The Buddha taught that one should not accept dogmas blindly. He did say though, that if one developed the ability to remember, one would no longer question the validity of rebirth (Jayatilleke in Nyanaponika and Walshe, 1971).

According to Buddhist cosmology the possibility of rebirth has many options. Every being creates their own reality; however the dimensions of these worlds cross over to form a realm. Accordingly there appears to be 31 levels of existence which can be further divided into six basic categories; the hell realm, the animal realm, the preta or hungry ghost realm, the demon or asura realm, the human realm and the heaven realms (Tambiah, 1970).

The range of heaven to hell can be experienced in our daily human existence. If one is generous, kind and considerate, abides by humanistic principles and develops concentration and wisdom, one reaps the results of these actions and lives with a mind that is happy and at peace. On the other hand if one cheats, lies, murders, steals and lives in an unmindful and immoral fashion, one eventually reaps the result.

Many people are unhappy. Angrily they struggle painfully with existence and are limited by their neurotic fears (hell). Others trap themselves by their stingy possessiveness and unsatiated desires (pretas). Some are just dumb, habitually endeavouring to fulfil their base desires for food and sex (animals), while others (such as some politicians or mega millionaires) are obsessed with power and control (demons). In the human realm most humans live as humans and use a kind of discriminative intelligence in an effort to maximise pleasure and minimise pain. Some people live quite a pleasant existence, they are happy and are willing to share their joy and material possessions with others. They are in heaven. If one is observant one can see how some human beings definitely live in extreme edges, or how at times one's own life seems to be dominated by heavenly or hellish mind states. The realms are a creation of our minds. On another level however, beings' subjective realities seem to overlap and become a collective objective reality.

Those who have had near death experiences (NDEs) and returned are convinced of the reality that lies beyond our usual physical human dimensions. The NDE-ers have reported being in places that seemed like the classic heaven and hell descriptions, (according to Grey, 1985). According to Buddhist thought, kamma is a law, and at death (like during life) beings can be set off in trajectiles that awaken the various accumulations of past negative or positive kamma. The time of physical death is therefore of utmost importance. One could, for example, have created much negative kamma and so seem destined for the realm of woe. However if at the moment of death a human or heaven-like mind state arose they could awaken their human or heaven-like kammic predispositions and so be born in a fortunate realm.

The descriptions of heaven are many and according to the texts (such as Buddhagosa, 1976) they range from the normal Christian type heaven where colours are rich, everything is beautiful and everyone is happy and well-fed, to very refined states of consciousness where one feels a oneness with the universe, or even that they are the creator of the universe. Bhramin or the 'I am' is said to exist in one of these realms.

Though it is preferred to be reborn in a 'heaven' realm the Buddha considered that even the most refined conditioned existence was impermanent and therefore unsatisfactory. The ultimate aim of Buddhist meditation and lifestyle is the unconditioned or Nibbana. Traditionally, if one is a Buddhist meditator there are two basic types of practice one can adopt. One type focuses on developing various levels of concentration upon static objects while the other aims at developing momentary (non-intellectual) insight into the nature of conditions (i.e. their impermanence, insubstantiality and unsatisfactoriness).

The concentration practices (according to Goleman in Tart, 1975) have a wide range of subjects. Some of these include fixing upon mental states such as unconditional loving-kindness (metta), to focusing upon mantras or visions of light. When the mind is developed with concentration it is said to be able to then penetrate into the nature of existence. With the insight method one tries to penetrate right from the beginning, and as one progresses concentration and therefore depth of penetration increases. It seems then that both paths eventually meet and lead to Nibbana. The problem with the concentration method, though, is that refined states of consciousness can be very blissful and develop supernormal powers (such as ESP). In these states, attachment and identification could be easy and so be an impediment on the path.

Preparing for Death

Negative mind states are painful; positive mind states are pleasant; Nibbana is freedom. "Yesterday is a memory, tomorrow the unknown, now is the knowing" (From a talk at Wat Buddha Dhamma, March 1984, by Ven Sumedho Bhikkhu). Ideally there is nothing to prepare for, only the awareness of and detachment to the present moment. It is very rare, however, to find someone who abides in the present moment detached and at peace. Most people that call themselves practising Buddhists do though endeavour to create conditions that are conducive to the above mind state. Even though Nibbana is the final goal, Buddhists prefer heaven to hell. In traditional Buddhist countries, there is a general awareness that one's present life may condition the next, and the people of, for example, Burma, Thailand or Tibet are renowned for their generosity and kindness. In these countries like anywhere else there are socialised customs, and it is common for people to go and chant at the temples daily. In one of these chants they remind themselves that they are of the nature to die.

Mullin claims that death awareness acts as a counter balance to a person's sexual energy. "Understanding our sexual energy helps us to realise the aggressive, powerful aspects of our nature. Understanding our mortality causes us to realise the passive, humble aspects, balancing our sense of aggression and power" (Mullin, 1983, p4). Elizabeth Kubler-Ross said (according to Mullin, 1983, p6) "We may achieve peace- our own inner peace as well as between nations by accepting the reality of our own death."

Traditionally death awareness has been practised amongst Buddhist monks for at least two thousand years. Some schools, do however, differ in their approach. Tibetan Buddhists consider death awareness useful for many reasons. For some it gives a more panoramic view of their lives, giving calm, and detachment and so not allowing the predisposition for negative kamma to arise. For others it allows a way to develop compassion and wisdom, and so again not develop negative kamma, by being more tolerant of others. Some highly advanced yogis actually practice the art of dying, and become adept with the mind states that may arise during the intermediatory state between life and the next rebirth. Death then becomes an opportunity to realise Nibbana and so be free from the cycles of birth and death.

Both the Theravadin (according to Buddhagosa, 1976) and Tibetan schools (Mullin, 1986) claim that without the recollection of death (consciously or unconsciously), one becomes intoxicated with mundane pursuits, one procrastinates, one's meditations become mixed with worldly concerns, one lacks energy to practice, one creates negative kamma and one dies in regret due to surprise. The advantages of death awareness are that one's life becomes purposeful as one investigates the nature of life, insight is developed and death will not be a surprise and so at the time of death negative mind states would be less likely to arise.

Both schools recommend reflecting upon the nature of death. Some of these reflection are as follows; death is inevitable; no being, whether famous, wealthy or enlightened escapes death, no worldly success can transcend death, life is fragile and dependent upon many conditions and the time of death is unpredictable.

The way a dying person actually faces the moment of death is, of course, dependent upon their habitual responses to life (kamma). Some people would therefore have an easy death while others struggle. According to many texts (such as Fremantle and Trungpa, 1976), when a human dies they enter into an intermediatory state between death and rebirth (also called the Bardo). Beings in this state (Vasubandhu in Kapleau, 1971) have abilities (such as ESP and travelling at great speeds), that are way beyond their previous, if human, existence. These beings also have intellect, emotion and will. This state still has momentary births and deaths, as well as a finite time span. The Tibetans claim it can last up to 49 days, however one can not be sure. (about its reality or time span.)

Kamma is transmitted to this intermediate being at the moment of physical death, the process being compared to a seal in muddy ground. The Bardo being is then drawn up by the force of its past accumulations or kamma to be born into whatever state is most resonate with its particular energy. Some highly advanced yogis, such as some Tibetan lamas, create the intention to be born as humans and while in their present incarnation predict to whom, where and when their next incarnation will be.

It would be nice to be able to control our destinies in such a way, however to most people death, like life, is a time of uncontrollability and uncertainty. During life people are often confronted with disappointment as life doesn't always turn out as expected or the way 'it should be'. Albert Ellis, a cognitive therapist, claims that much of human suffering comes from 'irrational beliefs' (Davison and Neale, 1982). 'One should be healthy', 'one should be successful' or even 'one should always be in love or be loved'. Occasionally expectations are fulfilled. However when they change (and they always do), expectation conditions disappointment and there is a tendency to cling and feel sorrow.

During life there are many moments of beauty, joy, love and happiness. However, if there is identification and attachment to these states they eventually condition their opposites. It seems then that a wise person therefore realises that when heaven like body states change according to their nature, resistance only conditions hell, and surrender is the best policy. So at death as with life he/she is at peace with conditions.

Humans can prepare for death by developing all sorts of reassuring religious beliefs or by developing high levels of concentration and so increase their chances of a heaven rebirth. If, on the other hand, one practices insight, life is just a constant process of surrender to the impermanence of conditions and 'death' is just another condition.

For the insight meditator detachment does not mean separation or disassociation from conditions and surrender does not mean apathetic passivity. Instead collectively they mean being honest, open, aware and allowing the processes of nature to occur unobstructed by views, concepts and desire. In a talk by a Buddhist monk, (Sumedho, 1983) it was said that the Buddha's teachings could be summarised into two words: 'letting go'. Clinging is a cause of suffering, so at death, like any other time, surrender is the best alternative.

Assisting others through death and beyond.

The law of kamma states that beings make their own kamma and no-one even a Buddha or 'God' can change it for them. It is possible, however, to choose company or situations that are conducive to wholesome states of mind. During life, understanding friends can help us feel happy and clarify our confusion. Beings create their own realities; however, it seems that other people can greatly affect how another may perceive that reality. Some people are fixed, rigid and destined to follow their habitual tendencies, while others are open and willing to listen and reach beyond their ego conditioning.

At the time of death a skilful death friend could act as a suitable catalyst to awaken wholesome tendencies and insight into the nature of life and death. A person has the right to live and die as they wish. It would be a hypocritical value judgement to tell a dying person that they 'should be' happy, peaceful, accepting, detached and so on. Kalish (1985) commented that a fulfilling death for some is to die in a rage. It seems then that the duty of a death assistant is firstly to be honest as honesty cultivates honesty, and secondly to be accepting as acceptance sets the emotional tone for 'letting go'.

A death assistant could be instrumental in protecting a dying persons rights from assumptions of others. Dr Evan Wentz once wrote (according to Mullin, 1983, p21) "just as the birth process can be aborted by malpractice so can the death process." In many hospitals it is often an automatic response to administer pain-killing drugs. The decision to reject mind-bending opiates could be facilitated and so allow the dying person to die in a state of mental clarity.

Those that know that they are about to die are probably more fortunate than those who die unexpectedly or suddenly. Traditionally in Buddhist countries, when a person is about to die the teachers and monks are invited to assist. The Tibetans claim that in the Bardo state, consciousness can be contacted and so have a text written to assist those who are dying, die and then guide them through the delicate territory of the intermediatory state to either fortuitous rebirths or enlightenment. In the bardo one is said to be confronted with peaceful and wrathful deities, which are in fact only aspects of one's own mind. Trungpa (1976) says that "The Tibetan Book of the Dead" is more like a 'Book of Life' as it serves as a reminder of how a being (living or in the bardo) has lived their life and so encourages them not to be shaken by degenerative temptations or unnecessary fear.

The book could have limited application to those unaccustomed to its cultural language. On a practical level Trungpa recommends that while helping a person to die, a friend should be honest and trustworthy and remind the person that what may occur is only the nature or/and projection of their own minds. "When you die you will have all sorts of traumatic experiences, of leaving your body, as well as your old memories coming back to you as hallucinations. Whatever the visions and hallucinations may be, just relate to what is happening rather than trying to run away. Keep there, just relate to that." (Fremantle and Trungpa, 1976, p28).

The moment of death can be aborted so an assistant should be sensitive to all conditions. Tibetan monks usually ask grieving relatives to leave the death bed as the grief could condition sadness in the dying person. In other situations, however, the presence of the dying person's family could be a condition for the arising of unconditional love and acceptance, or the opportunity to complete 'unfinished business' and so feel free to die with an attitude of peace and detachment.

For the living, death is the unknown (or at least the unremembered). A death assistant can pretend to know about death and how to die; however this knowledge is only based on assumption. We can only know about death by knowing life. The law of kamma is a law proven with investigation into our present day to day existence. Rebirth, though to most not a verified hypothesis, seems a possibility again only validated with personal experience. Attachment is the cause of suffering. If one is detached to life, death is no more or less important than having a cup of tea. Though one can help another die, it is of utmost importance that an ignorant assistant does not force his or her value judgements upon one who is at a very sensitive transition time in their existence. An assistant can, though, endeavour to create the environment, both physical and emotional whereby dying people, (and for that matter all sentient beings) are at peace with whatever conditions that may arise and pass away-die.

DEATH AND DYING IN THE TIBETAN

BUDDHIST TRADITION

Contemplation and meditation on death and impermanence are regarded as very important in Buddhism for two reasons : (1) it is only by recognising how precious and how short life is that we are most likely to make it meaningful and to live it fully and (2) by understanding the death process and familiarizing ourself with it, we can remove fear at the time of death and ensure a good rebirth.

Because the way in which we live our lives and our state of mind at death directly influence our future lives, it is said that the aim or mark of a spiritual practitioner is to have no fear or regrets at the time of death. People who practice to the best of their abilities will die, it is said, in a state of great bliss. The mediocre practitioner will die happily. Even the initial practitioner will have neither fear nor dread at the time of death. So one should aim at achieving at least the smallest of these results.

There are two common meditations on death in the Tibetan tradition. The first looks at the certainty and imminence of death and what will be of benefit at the time of death, in order to motivate us to make the best use of our lives. The second is a simulation or rehearsal of the actual death process, which familiarizes us with death and takes away the fear of the unknown, thus allowing us to die skilfully. Traditionally, in Buddhist countries, one is also encouraged to go to a cemetery or burial ground to contemplate on death and become familiar with this inevitable event.

The first of these meditations is known as the nine-round death meditation, in which we contemplate the 3 roots, the 9 reasonings, and the 3 convictions, as described below:

A DEATH IS CERTAIN

1. There is no possible way to escape death.
No-one ever has, not even Jesus, Buddha, etc. Of the current world population of over 5 billion people, almost none will be alive in 100 years time.

2. Life has a definite, inflexible limit and each moment brings us closer to the finality of this life.
We are dying from the moment we are born.

3. Death comes in a moment and its time is unexpected.
All that separates us from the next life is one breath.

Conviction: To practise the spiritual path and ripen our inner potential by cultivating positive mental qualities and abandoning disturbing mental qualities.

B THE TIME OF DEATH IS UNCERTAIN

4. The duration of our lifespan is uncertain.
The young can die before the old, the healthy before the sick, etc.

5. There are many causes and circumstances that lead to death, but few that favour the sustenance of life.

Even things that sustain life can kill us, for example food, motor vehicles, property.

6. The weakness and fragility of one's physical body contribute to life's uncertainty.
The body can be easily destroyed by disease or accident, for example cancer, AIDS, vehicle accidents, other disasters.

Conviction: To ripen our inner potential now, without delay.

C THE ONLY THING THAT CAN HELP US AT THE TIME OF DEATH IS OUR MENTAL/SPIRITUAL DEVELOPMENT (because all that goes on to the next life is our mind with its karmic (positive or negative) imprints.)

7. Worldly possessions such as wealth, position, money can't help.

8. Relatives and friends can neither prevent death nor go with us.

9. Even our own precious body is of no help to us.
We have to leave it behind like a shell, an empty husk, an overcoat.

Conviction: To ripen our inner potential purely, without staining our efforts with attachment to worldly concerns.

The second meditation simulates or rehearses the actual death process. Knowledge of this process is particularly important because advanced practitioners can engage in a series of yogas that are modelled on death, intermediate state (Tibetan: bar-do) and rebirth until they gain such control over them that they are no longer subject to ordinary uncontrolled death and rebirth.

It is therefore essential for the practitioner to know the stages of death and the mind-body relationship behind them. The description of this is based on a presentation of the winds, or currents of energy, that serve as foundations for various levels of consciousness, and the channels in which they flow. Upon the serial collapse of the ability of these winds to serve as bases of consciousness, the internal and external events of death unfold. Through the power of meditation, the yogi makes the coarse winds dissolve into the very subtle life-bearing wind at the heart. This yoga mirrors the process that occurs at death and involves concentration on the psychic channels and the channel-centres (chakras) inside the body.

At the channel-centres there are white and red drops, upon which physical and mental health are based. The white is predominant at the top of the head and the red at the solar plexus. These drops have their origin in a white and red drop at the heart centre, and this drop is the size of a small pea and has a white top and red bottom. It is called the indestructible drop, since it lasts until death. The very subtle life-bearing wind dwells inside it and, at death, all winds ultimately dissolve into it, whereupon the clear light vision of death dawns.

The physiology of death revolves around changes in the winds, channels and drops. Psychologically, due to the fact that consciousnesses of varying grossness and subtlety depend on the winds, like a rider on a horse, their dissolving or loss of ability to serve as bases of consciousness induces radical changes in conscious experience.

Death begins with the sequential dissolution of the winds associated with the four elements (earth, water, fire and air). "Earth" refers to the hard factors of the body such as bone, and the dissolution of the wind associated with it means that that wind is no longer capable of serving as a mount or basis for consciousness. As a consequence of its dissolution, the capacity of the wind associated with "water" (the fluid factors of the body) to act as a mount for consciousness becomes more manifest. The ceasing of this capacity in one element and its greater manifestation in another is called "dissolution" - it is not, therefore, a case of gross earth dissolving into water.

Simultaneously with the dissolution of the earth element, four other factors dissolve (see Chart 1), accompanied by external signs (generally visible to others) and an internal sign (the inner experience of the dying person). The same is repeated in serial order for the other three elements (see Charts 2-4), with corresponding external and internal signs.

CHART 1: FIRST CYCLE OF SIMULTANEOUS DISSOLUTION

Factor dissolving	External sign	Internal sign
earth element	body becomes very thin, limbs loose; sense that body is sinking under the earth

Upon the inception of the fifth cycle the mind begins to dissolve, in the sense that coarser types cease and subtler minds become manifest. First, conceptuality ceases, dissolving into a mind of white appearance. This subtler mind, to which only a vacuity filled by white light appears, is free from coarse conceptuality. It, in turn, dissolves into a heightened mind of red appearance, which then dissolves into a mind of black appearance. At this point all that appears is a vacuity filled by blackness, during which the person eventually becomes unconscious. In time this is cleared away, leaving a totally clear emptiness (the mind of clear light) free from the white, red and black appearances (see Chart 5). This is the final vision of death.

This description of the various internal visions correlates closely with the literature on the near-death experience. People who have had a near-death experience often describe moving from darkness (for example a black tunnel) towards a brilliant, peaceful, loving light. A comprehensive study comparing death and near-death experiences of Tibetans and Euro-Americans has shown many similarities between the two (Carr, 1993). Care must be taken though in such comparisons because the near-death experience is not actual death, that is, the consciousness permanently leaving the body.

Since the outer breath ceased some time before (in the fourth cycle), from this point of view the point of actual death is related not to the cessation of the outer breath but to the appearance of the mind of clear light. A person can remain in this state of lucid vacuity for up to three days, after which (if the body has not been ravaged by illness) the external sign of drops of red or white liquid emerging from the nose and sexual organ occur, indicating the departure of consciousness.

Other signs of the consciousness leaving the body are 1) when all heat has left the area of the heart centre (in the centre of the chest), 2) the body starts to smell or decompose, 3) a subtle awareness that the consciousness has left and the body has become like 'an empty shell', 4) a slumping of the body in a practitioner who has been sitting in meditation after the stopping of the breath. Buddhists generally prefer that the body not be removed for disposal before one or more of these signs occur, because until then the consciousness is still in the body and any violent handling of it may disturb the end processes of death. A Buddhist monk or nun or friend should ideally be called in before the body is moved in order for the appropriate prayers and procedures to be carried out.

When the clear light vision ceases, the consciousness leaves the body and passes through the other seven stages of dissolution (black near-attainment, red increase etc.) in reverse order. As soon as this reverse process begins the person is reborn into an intermediate state between lives, with a subtle body that can go instantly wherever it likes, move through solid objects etc., in its journey to the next place of rebirth.

The intermediate state can last from a moment to seven days, depending on whether or not a suitable birthplace is found. If one is not found the being undergoes a "small death", experiencing the eight signs of death as previously described (but very briefly). He/she then again experiences the eight signs of the reverse process and is reborn in a second intermediate state. This can happen for a total of seven births in the intermediate state (making a total of forty-nine days) during which a place of rebirth must be found.

The "small death" that occurs between intermediate states or just prior to taking rebirth is compared to experiencing the eight signs (from the mirage-like vision to the clear light) when going into deep sleep or when coming out of a dream. Similarly also, when entering a dream or when awakening from sleep the eight signs of the reverse process are experienced.

These states of increasing subtlety during death and of increasing grossness during rebirth are also experienced in fainting and orgasm as well as before and after sleeping and dreaming, although not in complete form. It is this great subtlety and clarity of the mind during the death process that makes it so valuable to use for advanced meditation practices, and why such emphasis is put on it in Buddhism. Advanced practitioners will often stay in the clear light meditation for several days after the breathing has stopped, engaging in these advanced meditations, and can achieve liberation at this time.

The Buddhist view is that each living being has a continuity or stream of consciousness that moves from one life to the next. Each being has had countless previous lives and will continue to be reborn again and again without control unless he/she develops his/her mind to the point where, like the yogis mentioned above, he/she gains control over this process. When the stream of consciousness or mind moves from one life to the next it brings with it the karmic imprints or potentialities from previous lives. Karma literally means "action", and all of the actions of body, speech and mind leave an imprint on the mind-stream. These karmas can be negative, positive or neutral, depending on the action. They can ripen at any time in the future, whenever conditions are suitable. These karmic seeds or imprints are never lost.

At the time of death (clear light stage) the consciousness (very subtle mind) leaves the body and the person takes the body of an intermediate state being. They are in the form that they will take in their next life (some texts say the previous life), but in a subtle rather than a gross form. As mentioned previously, it can take up to forty-nine days to find a suitable place of rebirth. This rebirth is propelled by karma and is uncontrolled. In effect the karma of the intermediate state being matches that of its future parents. The intermediate state being has the illusory appearance of its future parents copulating. It is drawn to this place by the force of attraction to its parent of the opposite sex, and it is this desire that causes the consciousness of the intermediate state being to enter the fertilized ovum. This happens at or near the time of conception and the new life has begun.

One will not necessarily be reborn as a human being. Buddhists describe six realms of existence that one can be reborn into, these being the hell realms, the preta (hungry ghost) realm, the animal realm, the human realm, the jealous god (asura) realm and the god (sura) realms. One's experience in these situations can range from intense suffering in the hell realms to unimaginable pleasures in the god realms. But all of these levels of existence are regarded as unsatisfactory by the spiritual practitioner because no matter how high one goes within this cyclic existence, one may one day fall down again to the lower realms of existence. So the aim of the spiritual practitioner is to develop his/her mind to the extent where a stop is put to this uncontrolled rebirth, as mentioned previously. The practitioner realises that all six levels of existence are ultimately in the nature of suffering, so wishes to be free of them forever.

The state of mind at the time of death is regarded as extremely important, because this plays a vital part in the situation one is reborn into. This is one reason why suicide is regarded in Buddhism as very unfortunate, because the state of mind of the person who commits suicide is usually depressed and negative and is likely to throw them into a lower rebirth. Also, it doesn't end the suffering, it just postpones it to another life.

When considering the spiritual care of the dying, it can be helpful to divide people into several different categories, because the category they are in will determine the most useful approach to use. These categories are: 1) whether the person is conscious or unconscious, and 2) whether they have a religious belief or not. In terms of the first category, if the person is conscious they can do the practices themselves or someone can assist them, but if they are unconscious someone has to do the practices for them. For the second category, if a person has specific religious beliefs, these can be utilised to help them. If they do not, they still need to be encouraged to have positive/virtuous thoughts at the time of death, such as reminding them of positive things they have done during their life.

For a spiritual practitioner, it is helpful to encourage them to have thoughts such as love, compassion, remembering their spiritual teacher. It is beneficial also to have an image in the room of Jesus, Mary, Buddha, or some other spiritual figure that may have meaning for the dying person. It may be helpful for those who are with the dying person to say some prayers, recite mantras etc. - this could be silent or aloud, whatever seems most appropriate.

However, one needs to be very sensitive to the needs of the dying person. The most important thing is to keep the mind of the person happy and calm. Nothing should be done (including certain spiritual practices) if this causes the person to be annoyed or irritated. There is a common conception that it is good to read "The Tibetan Book of the Dead" to the dying person, but if he/she is not familiar with the particular deities and practices contained in it, then this is not likely to prove very beneficial.

Because the death process is so important, it is best not to disturb the dying person with noise or shows of emotion. Expressing attachment and clinging to the dying person can disturb the mind and therefore the death process, so it is more helpful to mentally let the person go, to encourage them to move on to the next life without fear. It is important not to deny death or to push it away, just to be with the dying person as fully and openly as possible, trying to have an open and deep sharing of the person's fear, pain, joy, love, etc.

As mentioned previously, when a person is dying, their mind becomes much more subtle, and they are more open to receiving mental messages from those people close to them. So silent communication and prayer can be very helpful. It is not necessary to talk much. The dying person can be encouraged to let go into the light, into God's love etc. (again, this can be verbal or mental).

It can be very helpful to encourage the dying person to use breathing meditation - to let go of the thoughts and concentrate on the movement of the breath. This can be helpful for developing calmness, for pain control, for acceptance, for removing fear. It can help the dying person to get in touch with their inner stillness and peace and come to terms with their death. This breathing technique can be especially useful when combined with a mantra, prayer, or affirmation (i.e. half on the in-breath, half on the out-breath).

One of the Tibetan lamas, Sogyal Rinpoche, says that for up to about twenty-one days after a person dies they are more connected to the previous life than to the next one. So for this period in particular the loved ones can be encouraged to continue their (silent) communication with the deceased person - to say their good-byes, finish any unfinished business, reassure the dead person, encourage them to let go of their old life and to move on to the next one. It can be reassuring even just to talk to the dead person and at some level to know that they are probably receiving your message. The mind of the deceased person at this stage can still be subtle and receptive.

For the more adept practitioners there is also the method of transference of consciousness at the time of death (Tibetan: po-wa). With training, at the time of death, the practitioner can project his mind upwards from his heart centre through his crown directly to one of the Buddha pure realms, or at least to a higher rebirth. Someone who has perfected this training can also assist others at the time of death to project their mind to a good rebirth.

It is believed that if the consciousness leaves the body of the dead person through the crown or from a higher part of the body, it is likely to result in a good type of rebirth. Conversely, if the consciousness leaves from a lower part of the body this is likely to result in rebirth in one of the lower realms. For this reason, when a person dies it is believed that the first part of the body that should be touched is the crown. The crown is located about eight finger widths (of the person being measured) back from the (original) hairline. To rub or tap this area or gently pull the crown hair after a person dies is regarded as very beneficial and may well help the person to obtain a higher rebirth. Their are special blessed pills (po-wa pills) that can be placed on the crown after death which also facilitates this process.

Once the consciousness has left the body (which, as mentioned earlier, can take up to three days) it doesn't matter how the body is disposed of or handled (including the carrying out of a post-mortem examination) because in effect it has just become an empty shell. However, if the body is disposed of before the consciousness has left, this will obviously be very disturbing for the person who is going through the final stages of psychological dissolution.

This raises the question of whether or not it is advisable to donate one's organs after dying. The usual answer given by the Tibetan lamas to this question is that if the wish to donate one's organs is done with the motivation of compassion, then any disturbance to the death process that this causes is far outweighed by the positive karma that one is creating by this act of giving. It is another way in which one can die with a positive and compassionate mind.

A Tibetan tradition which is becoming more popular in the West is to get part of the remains of the deceased (e.g. ashes, hair, nails) blessed and then put into statues, tsa-tsas (Buddha images made of clay or plaster) or stupas (reliquary monuments representing the Buddha's body, speech and mind). These stupas for instance could be kept in the person's home, larger ones could be erected in a memorial garden. Making offerings to these or circumambulating them and so on is regarded as highly meritorious, both for the person who has died and for the loved ones.

There are also rituals for caring for the dead, for guiding the dead person through the intermediate state into a good rebirth. Such a ritual is "The Tibetan Book of the Dead", more correctly titled "Liberation Through Hearing in the Bardo".

'Impermanent' is the first of the three characteristics of existence. It is from the fact of impermanence that, in most texts, the other two characteristics, suffering (dukkha) and not-self (anatta), are derived.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³The Buddha ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

The generic name given to a unique individual who has achieved enlightenment through one's own effort during a period when the Dhamma is not known to mankind.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Dhamma ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

lit. the 'Bearer', Constitution (or Nature of things), Norm, Law, Doctrine; Justice, Righteousness; Quality; Thing, Object of mind; 'Phenomenon'. In all these meanings the word 'dhamma' is to be met within the texts.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Sangha ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

(lit.: congregation), is the name for the Community of Buddhist Monks and Nuns. As the third of the Three Gems or Jewels, and the Three Refuges.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Dukkha ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

(1) 'Pain', painful feeling, which may be bodily and mental (s. vedana).

(2) 'Suffering', 'Ill'. As the first of the four Noble Truths and the second of the three characteristics of existence the term 'dukkha' is not limited to painful experience, as under (1), but refers to the unsatisfactory nature and the general insecurity of all conditioned phenomena, which on account of their impermanence, are all liable to suffering; and this includes also pleasurable experience. Hence 'unsatisfactoriness' or 'liability to suffering' would be more adequate renderings, if not for stylistic reasons. Hence the first Truth does not deny the existence of pleasurable experience, as it is sometimes wrongly assumed.

This is illustrated by the following texts:

.PA

"Seeking satisfaction in the world, monks, I had pursued my way. That satisfaction in the world I found. In so far as satisfaction existed in the world. I have well perceived it by wisdom. Seeking for misery in the world, monks, I had pursued my way. That misery in the world I found. In so far as misery existed in the world, I have well perceived it by wisdom. Seeking for the escape from the world, monks, I had pursued my way. That escape from the world I found. In so far as escape from the world I found. I have well perceived it by wisdom."

"If there were no satisfaction to be found in the world, beings would not be attatched to the world.... If there were not misery to be found in the world, beings would not be repelled by the world... If there were no escape from the world, beings could not escape therefrom." [Ref. A.III.101/102] lit.:'Extinction'; according to the commentaries: 'Freedom from Desire'. Nibbana constitutes the highest and ultimate goal of all Buddhist aspirations, ie. absolute extinction of the life-affirming will manifested as Greed, Hate and Delusion, and convulsively clinging to existence; and therewith also the ultimate and absolute deliverence from all future 'rebirth', old age, disease and death, from all suffering and misery.

³Nibbana ³

³Bhavana ³

'Mental Development' is what in English generally but rather vaguely, is called 'meditation'.

One has to distinguish 2 kinds:

Development of tranquility (samatha-bhavana), ie. concentration (samadhi), and Development of Insight (vipassana-bhavana), ie. wisdom (panna).

³Kamma ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

(wholesome or unwholesome) Action.

³Nama ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÙ

(lit.: 'name'): 'Mind', mentality. This term is generally used as a collective name for the 4 mental groups (arupino khandha), viz.

consciousness (vinnana), perception (sanna), feeling (vedana), and mental formations (sankhara).

³Rupa ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÙ

RUPA-KALAPA: 'Corporeal Group', material unit, designates a combination of several physical/(chemical) phenomena constituting a temporary unity.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Anatta ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

'Not-self', Non-ego, egolessness, impersonality: is the last of the the Three Characteristics of existence. The anatta doctrine teaches that neither within the bodily and mental phenomena of existence, nor outside of them, can be found anything that in the ultimate sense could be regarded as a self-existing real Ego-entity, soul or any other abiding substance. This is the central doctrine of Buddhism, without an understanding of which a real knowledge of Buddhism is altogether impossible. It is the only specific Buddhist doctrine, with which the entire structure of the Buddhist teachings stands or falls.

All the remaining Buddhist doctrines may, more or less, be found in other philosophic systems and religions, but the Anatta-Doctrine has been clearly and unreservedly taught only by the Buddha, wherefore the Buddha is known as the Anatta-vadi, or teacher of Impersonality.

ÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ

"Whosoever has not penetrated this impersonality of all existence, and does not comprehend that in reality there exists only this continually self-consuming process of arising and passing bodily and mental phenomena, and that there is no separate Ego-entity within or without this process, he will not be able to understand Buddhism, ie., the teaching of the four Noble Truths, in the right light. He will think that it is his Ego, his personality, that experiences the suffering, his personality that performs good and evil actions and will be reborn according to these actions, his personality that will enter into Nirvana, his personality that walks on the Eightfold Path."

ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

'Round of Rebirth', li. 'perpetual wandering', is a name by which is designated the sea of life ever restlessly heaving up and down, the symbol of this continuous process of ever again and again being born, growing old, suffering and dying. More precisely put, Samsara is the unbroken chain of the fivefold Khandha-combinations, which, constantly changing from moment to moment follow continuously one upon the other through inconceivable periods of time.

³Magga ³

'Path'. Generally refered to as the Noble Eightfold Path, is the path leading to the extinction of suffering, ie. the last of the four noble truths, namely:

1. Right View (ditthi)
2. Right Thaught (sankappa)
3. Right Speech (vaca)
4. Right Bodily Action (Kammantha)
5. Right Livelihood (ajiva)
6. Right Effort (vayama)
7. Right Mindfulness (sati)
8. Right Concentration (samadhi)

³Sila ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÙ

'Morality', 'Virtue', is a mode of mind and volition (cetana) manifested in speech or bodily action (s. Karma). It is the foundation of the whole Buddhist practice, and therewith the first of the three kinds of Training that form the threefold division of the eightfold path, ie. morality, concentration and wisdom.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Samadhi ³

'Concentration', lit. 'the (mental) state of being firmly fixed', is the fixing of the mind on a single object.

³Panna ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

'Understanding', 'Knowledge', 'Wisdom', 'Insight', comprises a very wide field. The specific Buddhist knowledge or wisdom, however, as part of the noble eightfold path (magga) to deliverance, is Insight (vipassana), ie. the intuitive knowledge which brings about the realization of Nibbana, and which consists in the penetration of the Impermanency (anicca), Misery (dukkha) and Impersonality (anatta) of all forms of existence.

With regard to the condition of its arising one distinguishes three kinds of knowledge: Knowledge based on Learning (suta-maya-panna), knowledge based on Thinking (cinta-maya-panna), knowledge based on Mental Development (bhavana-maya-panna).

Dana

'Almsgiving', liberality, offering. "He who gives alms, bestows a fourfold blessing: he helps to prolong life, prolong good appearance, prolong happiness and strength. Therefore long life, good appearance happiness and strength will be his share, whether amongst heavenly beings or amongst men".

Other kinds of 'dana' include 'Shrama-dana', ie. being generous with one's time and skills, 'Abhaya-dana', ie. giving sanctuary to needy beings, etc.

Nekkhamma

'Freedom from Sensual Lust', renunciation. 'To go forth (into the homeless state of a monk)', this term is in the Pali texts nevertheless used as if it were derived from 'kama', lust, and always as an antonym to 'kama'. It is one of the ten perfections (s. parami).

eg. 'Sankappa', thought free from lust, or thought of renunciation, is one of the three kinds of Right Thought (samma-sankappa), the second link of the noble eightfold path, its antonym being 'kama-sankappa', lustful thought.

Citta

'Mind', 'Consciousness'. 'State of Consciousness', is a synonym of 'mano' and 'vinnana'.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Anapana-Sati ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

Mindfulness of In-and-out breathing, is one of the most important exercises for reaching mental concentration and the four absorptions.

Nowadays different instructors on meditation, give different interpretations to this technique of calming the mind, and this is also used as a stepping stone for Insight-meditation.

In the Satipatthana Sutta (ie. discourse on the Foundations of mindfulness) and elsewhere, four methods of practice are given which may also serve as basis for Insight meditation. (ie. Vipassana-Bhavana).

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Ariya-Puggala ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

Ariya-Puggala, or simply Ariya: 'Noble Ones', 'Nobel Persons'. The eight Ariyas are those who have realized one of the eight stages of holiness, ie. the four supermundane Paths (magga) and the four supermundane Fruitions (phala) of these paths. There are 4 pairs:-

1. The One realizing the path of Stream-winning (sotapatti-magga)
2. The One realizing the fruition of Stream-winning (sotapatti-phala)
3. The One realizing the path of Once-Return (sakadagami-magga)
4. The One realizing the fruition of Once-Return (sakadagami-phala)
5. The One realizing the path of Non-Return (anagami-magga)
6. The One realizing the fruition of Non-Return (anagami-phala)
7. The One realizing the path of Holiness (arahatta-magga)
8. The One realizing the fruition of Holiness (Arahatta-phala)

Summed up, there are 4 Noble Individuals: The stream-winner, the Once-Returner, the Non-Returner, and the Holy One.

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
³Atta-Kilamatha ³
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

'Self-mortification', is one of the two extremes to be avoided, the other extreme being addiction to sensual pleasures (kama-sukha), whilst the noble 8-fold path constitutes the middle path (majjhima-patipada). For further details about the middle path see under:

magga

ÚÄÄÄÄÄÄ¿
ÀÄÄÄÄÄÄÙ

'Ignorance', nescience, unknowing; synonymous with Delusion (moha) is the primary root of all evil and suffering in the world, veiling man's mental eyes and preventing him from seeing the true nature of things. It is the delusion tricking beings by making life appear to them as permanent, happy, substantial and beautiful and preventing them from seeing that everything in reality is impermanent, liable to suffering, void of 'I' and 'mine', and basically impure.

Ignorance is defined as 'not knowing the four nobel truths, namely suffering, its origin, its cessation, and the way to its cessation'.

BUDDHIST MEDITATION AND DEPTH PSYCHOLOGY

Introduction

Mind is the forerunner of all (evil) conditions.
Mind is their chief, and they are mind-made.
If, with an impure mind, one speaks or acts,
Then suffering follows one
Even as the cart wheel follows the hoof of the ox.

Mind is the forerunner of all (good) conditions.
Mind is their chief, and they are mind-made.
If, with a pure mind, one speaks or acts,
Then happiness follows one
Like a never-departing shadow.

These words, which are the opening lines of the Dhammapada, were spoken by Gotama Buddha 2500 years ago. They illustrate the central theme of Buddhist teaching, the human mind.

Buddhism is probably the least understood of all major religions. Indeed, from an Occidental viewpoint we might well question whether it warrants the title of religion. In the West we are accustomed to thinking of theology in terms of God, revelation, obedience, punishment, and redemption. The themes of creation, worship, judgement, and immortality have been major concerns in the Christian heritage and are virtually inseparable from our concept of religion. Against such a cultural background Western man views Buddhism and in so doing unconsciously projects his own concepts, values and expectations. Erroneously he perceives ceremonies and bowing as examples of worship or even idolatry.

He may extol its scientific world view or abhor and condemn its "atheism." The Buddha is vaguely equated with God or Jesus, and meditation is suspected of being a hypnotic approach to mysticism or an escape from reality.

However, such erroneous notions of the Dhamma, the teaching of the Buddha, are not entirely the result of Western ignorance and ethnocentrism. Before his demise the Buddha predicted that within a thousand years his doctrine would fall into the hands of men of lesser understanding and would thereby become corrupted and distorted.[1] Such has been the case throughout much, if not most, of the Orient. Ritual has replaced self-discipline, faith has replaced insight, and prayer has replaced understanding.

If the basis of Christianity is God, the basis of Buddhism is mind. From the Buddhist viewpoint, mind or consciousness is the core of our existence. Pleasure and pain, good and evil, time and space, life and death have no meaning to us apart from our awareness of them or thoughts about them. Whether God exists or does not exist, whether existence is primarily spiritual or primarily material, whether we live for a few decades or live forever -- all these matters are, in the Buddhist view, secondary to the one empirical fact of which we do have certainty: the existence of conscious experience as it proceeds through the course of daily living. Therefore Buddhism focuses on the mind; for happiness and sorrow, pleasure and pain are psychological experiences. Even such notions as purpose, value, virtue, goodness, and worth have meaning only as the results of our attitudes and feelings.

Buddhism does not deny the reality of material existence, nor does it ignore the very great effect that the physical world has upon us. On the contrary, it refutes the mind-body dichotomy of the Brahmans and says that mind and body are interdependent. But since the fundamental reality of human existence is the ever-changing sequence of thoughts, feelings, emotions, and perceptions which comprise conscious experience, then, from the viewpoint of early Buddhism, the primary concern of religion must be these very experiences which make up our daily lives. Most significant of these are love and hate, fear and sorrow, pride and passion, struggle and defeat. Conversely, such concepts as vicarious atonement, Cosmic Consciousness, Ultimate Reality, Buddha Nature, and redemption of sins are metaphysical and hypothetical matters of secondary importance to the realities of daily existence.

Therefore, in Buddhism the most significant fact of life is the first noble truth, the inevitable existence of //dukkha//. //Dukkha// is a Pali word embracing all types of displeasurable experience -- sorrow, fear, worry, pain, despair, discord, frustration, agitation, irritation, etc. The second noble truth states that the cause of //dukkha// is desire or craving. In various texts this cause is further explained as being threefold -- greed, hatred, and delusion. Again, on other occasions the Buddha divided the cause of suffering into five components -- sensual lust, anger, sloth or torpor, agitation or worry, and doubt. On still other occasions he listed ten causes of //dukkha// -- belief that oneself is an unchanging entity; scepticism; belief in salvation through rites, rules and ceremonies; sensual lust; hatred; craving for fine-material existence; craving for immaterial existence; conceit; restlessness; and ignorance. The Third Noble Truth states that //dukkha// can be overcome, and the Fourth Truth prescribes the means by which this is achieved.

Thus, with the Fourth Noble Truth, Buddhism becomes a technique, a discipline, a way of life designed to free people from sorrow and improve the nature of human existence. This aspect of the Dhamma is called the Noble Eightfold Path, and includes moral teachings, self-discipline, development of wisdom and understanding, and improvement of one's environment on both a personal and social level. These have been dealt with in previous writings and for the sake of brevity will not be repeated here. Suffice it to remind the reader that this essay is concerned with only one aspect of Buddhism, the practice of meditation. The ethical, practical, and logical facets of the Teaching are covered in other publications.

If the cause of suffering is primarily psychological, then it must follow that the cure, also, is psychological. Therefore, we find in Buddhism a series of "mental exercises" or meditations designed to uncover and cure our psychic aberrations.

Mistakenly, Buddhist meditation is frequently confused with yogic meditation, which often includes physical contortions, autohypnosis, quests for occult powers, and an attempted union with God. None of these are concerns or practices of the Eightfold Path. There are in Buddhism no drugs or stimulants, no secret teachings, and no mystical formulae. Buddhist meditation deals exclusively with the everyday phenomena of human consciousness. In the words of the Venerable Nyanaponika Thera, a renowned Buddhist scholar and monk:

> In its spirit of self-reliance, Satipatthana does not require any elaborate //technique// or external devices. The daily life is its working material. It has nothing to do with any exotic cults or rites nor does it confer "initiations" or "esoteric knowledge" in any way other than by self-enlightenment.
> Using just the conditions of life it finds, Satipatthana does not require complete seclusion or monastic life, though in some who undertake the practice, the desire and need for these may grow.[2]

Lest the reader suspect that some peculiarity of the "Western mind" precludes Occidentals from the successful practice of meditation, we should note also the words of Rear Admiral E.H. Shattock, a British naval officer, who spent three weeks of diligent meditation practice in a Theravada monastery near Rangoon:

> Meditation, therefore, is a really practical occupation: it is in no sense necessarily a religious one, though it is usually thought of as such. It is itself basically academic, practical, and profitable. It is, I think, necessary to emphasize this point, because so many only associate meditation with holy or saintly people, and regard it as an advanced form of the pious life.... This is not the tale of a conversion, but of an attempt to test the reaction of a well-tried Eastern system on a typical Western mind.[3]

Reading about meditation is like reading about swimming; only by getting into the water does the aspiring swimmer begin to progress. So it is with meditation and Buddhism in general. The Dhamma must be lived, not merely thought. Study and contemplation are valuable tools, but life itself is the training ground.

The following passages are attempts to put into words what must be experienced within oneself. Or in the words of the Dhammapada: "Buddhas only point the way. Each one must work out his own salvation with diligence." Meditation is a personal experience, a subjective experience, and consequently each of us must tread his or her own path towards the summit of Enlightenment. By words we can instruct and encourage but words are only symbols for reality.

The Goals of Meditation

Before discussing the techniques of meditation, it is important that we first define its goals. That is, why does one meditate? What does one hope to achieve?

The ultimate goals of meditation are the ultimate goals of Buddhism, i.e. realization of Nibbana and the abolition of //dukkha// or suffering. Nibbana, however, is beyond the realm of conceptualization and all other forms of normal human experience. Therefore, we have no certainty that it exists until we ourselves have progressed to realizing it as a direct experience transcending logic and sense perception. Nibbana can thus be defined as that which is experienced when one has achieved ultimate moral and psychological maturation. Little more can be said.

Therefore the Buddha said relatively little about Nibbana and instead directed most of his teachings towards two lesser goals which are empirical realities of readily demonstrable worth. These were, first, the increase, enhancement, and cultivation of positive feelings such as love, compassion, equanimity, mental purity, and the happiness found in bringing happiness to others. Secondly, he advocated the relinquishment and renunciation of greed, hatred, delusion, conceit, agitation, and other negative, unwholesome states.

As we gain in experience and self-understanding, and as we acquire full appreciation for the nature and quality of our own feelings, we find that the positive feelings (love, compassion, etc.) are satisfying, meaningful, and wholesome experiences in and of themselves. That is, they have their own inherent worth and intrinsic value independent of any world view or religious dogma. Conversely, greed, hatred, lust, etc., are agitating, discomforting experiences (i.e. //dukkha//) which when present preclude a full realization of the happiness born of love and equanimity. Thus the realization of positive feelings and relinquishment of negative feelings are the major goals and motivations of meditation.

While Nibbana and an end of suffering are the primary goals of meditation and the realization of positive feelings is a secondary goal, there are also several tertiary goals which must be achieved before the higher ones can be fully realized. These are non-attachment, insight, and concentration.

//Non-attachment// is freedom from craving and freedom from infatuation for sensual experience. It is not a state of chronic apathy nor a denial of sense perception existence. Rather it is psychological liberation from our "enslaving passions and our addictions to sensual and emotional pleasures." Thus non-attachment is akin to freedom, equanimity, and serenity.

//Insight// is a word with two meanings both of which are sought in Buddhist meditation. In its classical Buddhist usage insight (//vipassana//) means full //awareness// of the three characteristics of existence, i.e. impermanence, suffering (//dukkha//), and impersonality. Otherwise stated, this means full realization of the fact that all things in the universe are temporary and changing; the human psyche is no exception and thus is not an immortal soul; and as a consequence suffering is always inevitable, for no state of mind, pleasant or unpleasant, can endure forever. The word "awareness" is italicized here to distinguish it from mere conceptual knowledge, which is usually insufficient to have lasting effect upon one's feelings and values.

In its psychiatric usage insight means gaining awareness of those feelings, motives, and values which have previously been unconscious. Repressed feelings of guilt, fear, lust, and hatred may lurk in the hidden recesses of our minds and unconsciously shape our lives until such time as they are brought into awareness. And unless they are brought into awareness, we cannot effectively deal with them. In Buddhism this version of insight is included under the heading of mindfulness and will be discussed later.

//Concentration// involves the ability to keep one's attention firmly fixed on a given subject for protracted periods of time, thus overcoming the mind's usual discursive habit of flitting from subject to subject. As we shall see, concentration is one of the earliest goals of Buddhist meditation.

Preparations

The initial endeavour in Buddhist meditation is to quiet the mind and enhance detachment and objectivity. For only when the mind has stilled its perpetual ruminating and has momentarily abandoned its fascination for sensory experience can it readily become aware of the unconscious feelings and motivations which shape our thoughts, speech, and behaviour. Furthermore, only with detached objectivity and its ensuing insights can we readily confront and renounce unwholesome feelings. On the other hand, we do not achieve complete calmness and detachment so long as we harbour unwholesome feelings and unconscious emotional conflicts. Thus the process is reciprocal: the more we quiet the mind, the more we gain insight and relinquishment of undesirable feelings. The more we relinquish such feelings and resolve emotional conflicts, the more we quiet the mind and approach perfect calmness, detachment, and objectivity.

The obscuring of unconscious feelings by preoccupation with thoughts and actions is demonstrated in a variety of neurotic symptoms. Most characteristic are obsessive compulsive reactions; these occur in persons who are desperately trying to repress overpowering impulses of fear, anger, lust, or guilt. In order to achieve this repression they divert nearly all their attention to some repetitious mental or physical activity, which is conducted in a compulsive, ritualistic manner. If prevented from performing their defensive rituals, they often become acutely anxious and even panic as their unconscious feelings begin to come into awareness. Less severe examples of the same defensive phenomena are seen in persons who are chronically anxious and are continuously focusing their worries on minor concerns of exaggerated importance such as unpaid bills, social commitments, and alleged physical ills. They, too, rarely relax and are forever busy with petty chores.

These neurotic symptoms are strikingly similar to an increasingly common way of life in Western society. Our ever-expanding populations with their accompanying advertising, mass entertainment, socializing, industrialization, and emphasis upon success, sensuality, and popularity have produced an environment in which we are forever bombarded with an increasing number of sensory and emotional stimuli. The opportunities for solitude and introspection have diminished to the point that now solitude is often viewed as either depressing or abnormal. This is not to assert that the majority of our citizens are involved in a frantic endeavour to escape from their inner selves. Such is no doubt the case with many, but there still remains a sizeable percentage of people who are involved in the same frenzy only because they have conformed to the social norm and have been lured into a habitual fascination for television, jazz, sports, and the countless other forms of readily-available entertainment. Such persons are not necessarily precluded from relative happiness and emotional well-being.

The point to be made, however, is that the conditions of modern living are such as to pose several obstacles to successful meditation. These are threefold: psychological, material, and social. These same obstacles are present to a lesser degree in traditionally Buddhist cultures and must be considered before discussing meditation itself.

Psychological Obstacles

It is virtually impossible for a busy person with manifold worldly ambitions to suddenly and voluntarily quiet his mind to the point of removing all discursive thoughts. In a matter of minutes, if not seconds, the meditator will find himself either planning, reminiscing, or day-dreaming. Therefore, before one begins meditation, some amount of moral development and self-discipline should be achieved. In the words of one of the Buddha's disciples:

> "Those salutary rules of morality proclaimed by the Exalted One, for what purpose, brother Ananda, has he proclaimed them?"
> "Well said, brother Bhadda, well said! Pleasing is your wisdom, pleasing your insight, excellent is your question! Those salutary rules of morality proclaimed by the Exalted One, were proclaimed by him for the sake of cultivating the four foundations of mindfulness (i.e. meditation)."[4]

In every Buddhist country only a minority of devotees undertake regular practice. The decision to meditate rests with each individual. Many wait until their later years when moral development has progressed and family obligations have been fulfilled. On the other hand, meditation facilitates wisdom and morality and can be of benefit to the layman as well as the monk.

In addition to adjusting one's daily routine and cultivating morality and wisdom, it is often profitable to take a few minutes before each meditation to put one's mind in a receptive condition.

This may be done by reflecting upon the goals and advantages of meditation or by reading or reciting some chosen passage of Buddhist literature or other appropriate writing. If drowsy, a brisk walk may freshen one's mind and can also allow one to think over and mentally dispense with matters which might otherwise be distracting. Also, if one has some necessary chores to perform which can be executed quickly and easily, doing these beforehand will reduce their interference with meditation.

Material Considerations

Much has been written in both ancient and modern literature about the physical and environmental factors conducive to successful meditation. Mostly these are matters of common sense, which each person must determine for himself on the basis of his own individual needs and predispositions. In the //Visuddhimagga// we read:

> //Food//: sweet food suits one, sour food another.
> //Climate//: a cool climate suits one, a warm one another. So when he finds that by using a certain food or by living in a certain climate he is comfortable, or his unconcentrated mind becomes concentrated, or his concentrated mind more so, then that food or that climate is suitable. Any other food or climate is unsuitable.
> //Postures//: Walking suits one; standing or sitting or lying down another. So he should try them, like the abode, for three days each, and that posture is suitable in which his unconcentrated mind becomes concentrated or his concentrated mind more so. Any other should be understood as unsuitable.[5]

is rarely possible, but even relative seclusion is of value. How this is achieved must be determined by the practitioner's individual opportunities and circumstances. The time and duration of meditation will also vary with individual situations. Ideally one should choose a time when one's mind is alert. Fifteen to forty-five minutes is recommended for lay beginners, and many persons are of the opinion that it should be at the same time each day, preferably in the early morning. A good night's sleep and moderation in eating are valuable, but one should avoid an excess of fasting and sleep.

The preferred posture in both Asia and the West is the lotus posture or similar positions of sitting on the ground with legs folded. A cushion or other padding is desirable for comfort. These positions furnish maximum physical stability without the need of a back rest or other devices and are especially suitable if one intends to remain alert and motionless for protracted periods of time. However, many Occidentals are unaccustomed to this posture and are thus unable to assume it or can do so only with discomfort. With practice this difficulty is usually overcome; otherwise one can meditate seated on a chair. The eyes either can be closed or resting on some neutral object such as a blank place on the ground or a simple geometric shape at a distance of three or four feet.

Social Factors

In Burma meditation is discussed with interest and enthusiasm.[6] Men of national fame will take a leave of absence to further their training, and a practitioner is often greeted with the words, "And how are you progressing in your meditation? Have you reached such and such a stage yet?"

The antithesis is true in America, where meditation is poorly understood; in fact usually it is misunderstood. First of all, the relinquishment of worldly pursuits for the sake of spiritual and psychological gain is foreign to the prevailing values of both capitalist and socialist societies. Secondly, Americans often equate meditation with hypnotic trance, mysticism, or the occult. Consequently, the Occidental practitioner may conceal his practice to avoid social ridicule and religious antagonism. This problem is compounded by the existence of various quasi-religious and pseudo-scientific cults which often attract neurotics and social misfits with promises of occult powers, lasting happiness, and physical health. Such organizations often claim "esoteric" meditations and speak favourably (though ignorantly) of Hinduism and Buddhism. Too often Western impressions of Buddhism are gained either through these sources and their associated literature or through the unfavourable descriptions given by pro-Christian books, magazines, and newspapers.

Individual Variations

As we shall see, there are a variety of different meditation practices each intended for specific individual need. In traditionally Buddhist countries novices often seek a learned monk or meditation master and ask to be assigned a specific meditation subject.[7] In the Occident this is virtually impossible. Competent meditation masters are few and far between, and those masters who do visit our shores find that linguistic and cultural barriers prevent them from adequately appraising a novice's needs. Thus the Western Buddhist must fend for himself, relying on his own judgement and proceeding sometimes by trial and error. Here, again, we should note the words of the //Visuddhimagga//:

> For when a very skilful archer, who is working to split a hair, actually splits the hair on one occasion, he discerns the modes of the position of his feet, the bow, the bowstring, and the arrow thus: "I split the hair as I stood thus, with the bow thus, the bowstring thus, the arrow thus." From then on he recaptures those same modes and repeats the splitting of the hair without > fail. So too the meditator must discern such modes as that of suitable food, etc. thus: "I attained this after eating this food, attending on such a person, in such a lodging, in this posture, at this time." In this way, when that (absorption) is lost, he will be able to recapture those modes and renew the absorption, or while familiarizing himself with it he will be able to repeat that absorption again and again.[8]

Not only do meditation requirements differ from person to person, they also differ for the same person at different times. In the words of the Buddha:

> "Monks, suppose a man wanted to make a small fire burn up, and he put wet grass on it, put wet cowdung on it, put wet sticks on it, sprinkled it with water, and scattered dust on it, would that man be able to make the small fire burn up?" -- "No, venerable sir." -- "So too, monks, when the mind is slack, that is not the time to develop the tranquillity enlightenment factor, the concentration enlightenment factor, and the equanimity enlightenment factor. Why is that? Because a slack mind cannot well be roused by those states. When the mind is slack, that is the time to develop the investigation-of-states enlightenment factor, the energy enlightenment factor, and the happiness enlightenment factor. Why is that? Because a slack mind can well be roused by those states.
> "Monks, suppose a man wanted to extinguish a great mass of fire, and he put dry grass on it, ... and did not scatter dust on it, would that man be able to extinguish that great mass of fire?" -- "No, venerable sir." -- "So too, monks, when the mind is agitated, that is not the time to develop the investigation-of-states enlightenment factor, the energy enlightenment factor, or the happiness enlightenment factor. Why is that? Because an agitated mind cannot well be quieted by those states. When the mind is agitated, that is the time to develop the tranquillity enlightenment factor, the concentration enlightenment factor, and the equanimity enlightenment factor. Why is that? Because an agitated mind can well be quieted by those states."[9]

There is no prescribed duration for the amount of time one should spend in meditation. The popular Western notion of Buddhist monks spending a lifetime with nearly every available moment dedicated to meditative seclusion is not supported by the recorded teachings of the Buddha nor the accounts of the daily activities of the Buddha and his followers. Nor is this the case with Theravada monks today, except during temporary periods of intensive training. As with all other aspects of meditation, the amount of time must be varied according to individual needs and circumstances.

One final point must be made before proceeding to the techniques of meditation. It is simply this: //Meditation requires patience, persistence, and effort. For one who practises less than several hours a day, lasting and notable progress can only be achieved by months, if not years, of endeavour. There are no short cuts or magical formulae//. Consequently, the aspiring practitioner should not expect quick results and before starting should decide if he sincerely intends to put forth the necessary time and effort. A decision not to meditate, however, in no way precludes one from progressing towards the same goals of insight, non-attachment, concentration, etc. Their full realization requires formal meditation practice, but relative success may be acquired at a slower pace through cultivation of one's moral and intellectual faculties.[10]

The Techniques of Meditation

The seventh step of the Noble Eightfold Path is termed right mindfulness, also called the four foundations of mindfulness and Satipatthana. The three terms are synonymous and encompass not only the most important aspects of Theravada meditation but also one of the most unique and important features of all Buddhism. A full explanation of mindfulness or Satipatthana is given in the Satipatthana Sutta, which appears twice in the Pali Canon. The Buddha begins the discourse as follows:

> This is the only way, monks, for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for the destruction of suffering and grief, for reaching the right path, for the attainment of Nibbana, namely the Four Foundations of Mindfulness.[11]

This same message he repeated frequently:

> Those for whom you have sympathy, O monks, those who deem it fit to listen to you -- friends and companions, kinsmen and relatives -- they should be encouraged, introduced to and established in the four foundations of mindfulness.[12]

And again:

> There are three taints (//asava// or cankers), O monks: the taint of sensuality, the taint of desire for renewed existence, and the taint of ignorance. For eliminating these three taints, O monks, the four foundations of mindfulness should be cultivated.[13]

This same emphasis has persisted even to the present era in some sections of the Buddhist world, as described by the Venerable Nyanasatta Thera:

> The great importance of the Discourse on Mindfulness (i.e. the Satipatthana Sutta) has never been lost to the Buddhists of the Theravada tradition. In Ceylon, even when the knowledge and practice of the Dhamma was at its lowest ebb through centuries of foreign domination, the Sinhala Buddhists never forgot the Satipatthana Sutta. Memorizing the Sutta has been an unfailing practice among the Buddhists, and even today in Ceylon there are large numbers who can recite the Sutta from memory. It is a common sight to see on full-moon days devotees who are observing the eight precepts, engaged in community recital of the Sutta. Buddhists are intent on hearing this Discourse even in the last moments of their lives; and at the bed-side of a dying Buddhist either monks or laymen recite this venerated text.[14]

Thus it seems a paradox that most Western texts on Buddhism merely list right mindfulness as one of the steps of the Eightfold Path and say little more except to redefine it by such terms as "right contemplation" and "right reflection." The reason is probably twofold. First, Satipatthana cannot be as concisely explained as the other seven steps; for it is not a single step but includes instead several distinct meditation exercises. Second, to be properly understood the Satipatthana Sutta must be examined from a psychological and psychiatric viewpoint. Most scholars of comparative religion are accustomed to approaching their studies from religious, ethical, or philosophical frames of reference, but none of these orientations apply here. If this sutta alone was to be filed on the shelves of a public library, it would most aptly be placed adjacent to the archives of eclectic psychiatry and would have little in common with the classic writings of religion and philosophy. Even psychology would not be an appropriate title, for the sutta is not concerned with any theoretical or conceptual interpretation of the mind. It deals only with the empirical facts of conscious experience and prescribes the techniques for mental development. It is, therefore, not surprising that many Occidentals who have scanned the pages of the Satipatthana Sutta have judged it confusing, meaningless, and sometimes morbid.

In addition to the two occurrences of the Satipatthana Sutta, condensed versions of the same teaching appear several times in the Sutta Pitaka.

The four parts of the four foundations of mindfulness are: contemplation of the body, contemplation of feelings, contemplation of mind, and contemplation of mental objects. The body contemplation is itself divided into six parts -- breathing, postures, clear comprehension of action, repulsiveness, material elements, and the cemetery meditations.

Mindfulness of Breathing

The initial endeavour in Buddhist meditation is to calm and quiet the mind so that it is fully alert but has temporarily diminished the quantity of daydreaming, planning, reminiscing, and all other forms of verbal and visual thinking. This goal can only be approached gradually, and therefore the beginner should start his practice by focusing his attention on some quiet, readily available, rhythmic process. Respiratory movements are ideal for this purpose. Thus the first exercise of the sutta begins:

> Herein, monks, a monk having gone to the forest, to the foot of a tree, or to an empty place, sits down cross-legged, keeps his body erect and his mindfulness alert. Just mindful he breathes in and mindful he breathes out. Breathing in a long breath, he knows "I breathe in a long breath"; breathing out a long breath, he knows "I breathe out a long breath"; breathing in a short breath, he knows "I breathe in a short breath"; breathing out a short breath, he knows "I breathe out a short breath." "Conscious of the whole (breath-) body, I shall breathe in," thus he trains himself. "Conscious of the whole (breath-) body, I shall breathe out," thus he trains himself. "Calming the bodily function (of breathing), I shall breathe in," thus he trains himself. "Calming the bodily function (of breathing), I shall breathe out," thus he trains himself. As a skilful turner or his apprentice, making a long turn, knows "I am making a long turn," or making a short turn, knows "I am making a short turn," just so the monk breathing in a long breath, knows "I breathe in a long breath"; breathing out a long breath, he knows "I breathe out a long breath."...

The practitioner endeavours to keep his mind focused only on the act of breathing itself and not to think about breathing as a subject of intellectual contemplation. In other words, one attempts to give full attention to the reality of immediate experience and not become involved in speculations or contemplations //about// reality.

The theory is quite simple but the practice most difficult. In a typical case, at the beginning of his meditation the novice directs his attention solely to the process of breathing. Then after a few seconds, he inadvertently begins to think, "So far I am doing all right. My mind hasn't strayed from its subject." But at this very moment he has strayed from his subject. For now he is not concentrating but thinking about concentrating. If he does not catch himself (and he probably will not), the stream of consciousness will proceed something as follows: "My mind hasn't strayed from its subject. I'm doing better than yesterday. I wonder why? Maybe it's because I've finished all of my letter writing. I wonder if Marvin will answer the letter I sent him? He hasn't.... Oh, Oh! I've gotten off the subject. I'd better get back to it. But I'm not really back; I'm just thinking about it. I wonder how long it will take me...." And so on it goes, day after day, week after week until the practitioner begins to wonder if he is not seeking the impossible. Yet the fact remains that many thousands living today have achieved this degree of concentration. With little short of amazement, the Western novice reads the Venerable Nyanaponika Thera's remarks concerning Burmese Satipatthana training: "Three to four hours of continuous mindfulness, i.e. without unnoticed breaks, are regarded as the minimum for a beginner undergoing a course of strict practice."[15]

The most widely practised form of the breathing meditation is focusing attention at the nostrils where one feels the faint pressure of the ebb and flow of the breath. This technique is not mentioned in any of the recorded teachings of the Buddha or his disciples but has been popular at least since the time of Buddhaghosa in the fifth century A.D. In the words of Buddhaghosa:

> This is the simile of the gate-keeper: just as a gate-keeper does not examine people inside and outside the town, asking "Who are you? Where have you come from? Where are you going? What have you got in your hand?" -- for those people are not his concern -- , but does examine each man as he arrives at the gate, so too, the incoming breaths that have gone inside and the outgoing breaths that have gone outside are not this monk's concern, but they are > his concern each time they arrive at the (nostril) gate itself.[16]

And again, in the simile of the saw, the woodcutter's attention is focused only at the point of contact between the saw and the wood:

> As the saw's teeth, so the in-breaths and out-breaths. As the man's mindfulness, established by the saw's teeth where they touch the tree trunk, without his giving attention to the saw's teeth as they approach and recede, though they are not unknown to him as they do so, and so he manifests effort, carries out a task and achieves an effect, so too the bhikkhu sits, having established mindfulness at the nose tip or on the upper lip, without giving attention to the in-breaths and out-breaths as they approach and recede, though they are not unknown to him as they do so, and he manifests effort, carries out a task and achieves an effect.[17]

Modifications of the breathing meditation can be applied to suit individual requirements. In the early stages of practice many persons find that mentally counting the breaths enhances concentration. In these instances one is advised not to count less than five or more than ten. Upon reaching ten the counting starts over. By going beyond ten, the counting rather than the breathing is likely to become the subject of one's attention:

> Herein, this clansman who is a beginner should first give attention to this meditation subject by counting. And when counting, he should not stop short of five or go beyond ten or make any break in the series. By stopping short of five his thoughts get excited in the cramped space, like a herd of cattle shut in a cramped pen. By going beyond ten his thoughts take the number (rather than the breaths) for their support.[18]
> But how long is he to go on counting? Until, without counting, mindfulness remains settled on the in-breaths and out-breaths as its object. For counting is simply a device for settling mindfulness on the in-breaths and out-breaths as object by > cutting off the external dissipation of applied thoughts.[19]

In the initial stages of practice one merely observes the process of breathing without attempting to change its rate or depth. Later, as concentration is achieved, the breathing is gradually and deliberately slowed in order to further quiet the mind. There is, however, no attempt to stop respiration as in certain yogic practices:

> When his gross in-breaths and out-breaths have ceased, his consciousness occurs with the sign of the subtle in-breaths and out-breaths as its object. And when that has ceased, it goes on occurring with the successively subtler signs as its object. How? Suppose a man struck a bronze bell with a big iron bar and at once a loud sound arose, his consciousness would occur with the gross sound as its object; then, when the gross sound had ceased, it would occur afterwards with the sign of the subtle sound as its object; and when that had ceased, it would go on occurring with the sign of the successively subtler sound as its object.[20]

It was a Burmese meditation teacher, Venerable U Narada (Mingun Sayadaw), who in the early part of this century, stressed the application of mindfulness of breathing as a means of cultivating direct awareness. It was he who gave the first strong impetus to the revival of Satipatthana meditation in contemporary Burma. He passed away in 1955 at the age of 87 and is said by many to have realized Nibbana.

A variation of the breathing meditation was developed by another Burmese monk, the Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw, who was a pupil of the Venerable U Narada. His technique involves focusing attention upon the respiratory movements of the abdomen instead of the sensation at the nostrils. This system has become popular in several parts of southern Asia. A revived interest in meditation has developed in that section of the world, especially in Burma, where numerous training centres have been established, and thousands of monks and lay people have received instruction.[21]

During meditation, when the practitioner finds that his mind has strayed from its subject, there should be no attempt to suppress or forcibly remove the extraneous thoughts. Rather he should briefly take mental note of them and objectively label them with some appropriate term. This may be done by thinking to himself "planning," "remembering," "imagining," etc., as the case may be. Then he should return to his original meditation subject. However, if after several tries the unwanted thoughts persist, he should temporarily take the thoughts themselves as the meditation subject. In so doing their intensity will diminish, and he can then return to his original subject. This same technique can be used for distracting noises. It can also be used for feelings of anger or frustration, which may develop as the result of unwanted thoughts or distractions. In these instances the meditator should think to himself "noise," or "irritation."[22]

As the mind becomes quiet and verbal thinking begins to diminish, other stimuli come into awareness. Among these are sensations, such as itches and minor pains, which are always present but go unnoticed because attention is directed elsewhere. The same may occur with emotions such as worry or fear, and these we shall discuss in detail later. Pictures or visual scenes may arise and are often so vivid as to be termed visions or hallucinations. They often have the appearance of dreams or distant memories and differ from thoughts in that the meditator usually finds himself a passive spectator not knowing when such scenes will arise or what forms they will take. The meditator should first attempt to ignore these sensations, feelings, and pictures. This failing, he should label them "itching," "fear," "picture," etc., and lastly make them his meditation subject until they diminish.[23]

To be successful, meditation should not be an unpleasant experience. Strain and tension should be minimized. Therefore, if the practitioner finds himself becoming tense, irritable, or fatigued during meditation, he may wish to terminate the practice until he acquires a better state of mind.

Mindfulness of Postures and of Actions

Following mindfulness of breathing, the next exercise prescribed in the Satipatthana Sutta is the development of the same clear awareness towards one's daily actions. Thus the Buddha continues:

> And further, monks, a monk knows when he is going "I am going"; he knows when he is standing "I am standing"; he knows when he is sitting "I am sitting"; he knows when he is lying down "I am lying down"; or just as his body is disposed so he knows it.
> And further, monks, a monk, in going forward and back, applies clear comprehension; in looking straight on and looking away, he applies clear comprehension; in bending and in stretching, he applies clear comprehension; in wearing robes and carrying the bowl, he applies clear comprehension; in eating, drinking, chewing and savouring, he applies clear comprehension; in attending to the calls of nature, he applies clear comprehension; in walking, in standing, in sitting, in falling asleep, in walking, in speaking and in keeping silence, heapplies clear comprehension.

Here we note a similarity between early Buddhism and Zen. Or as the Zen master would say: "In walking, just walk. In sitting, just sit. Above all, don't wobble."

Usually while dressing, eating, working, etc., we act on habit and give little attention to our physical actions. Our minds are preoccupied with a variety of other concerns. In Satipatthana, however, the practitioner devotes himself entirely to the situation at hand. Persons interested in meditation are often heard to complain, "But I don't have time to meditate." However, the form of mindfulness we are now discussing can be practised at all times and in all situations regardless of one's occupation or social and religious commitments.

As with breathing meditation, the primary intent of this discipline is to prepare one's mind for advanced stages of psychological development. However, a valuable by-product is that it can greatly increase one's proficiency at physical skills. In Japan, Zen practitioners have utilized it to achieve mastery in swordsmanship, archery, and judo. The Buddha himself is quoted: "Mindfulness, I declare, O monks, is helpful everywhere."[24] And again:

> Whosoever, monks, has cultivated and regularly practised mindfulness of the body, to whatever state realizable by direct knowledge he may bend his mind for reaching it by direct knowledge, he will then acquire proficiency in that very field.[25]

For one engaged in strict monastic training, mindfulness of actions becomes a more formalized practice. Breathing and walking meditations often are alternated for periods of about thirty minutes each. In walking the monk paces slowly along a level stretch of ground and directs his attention fully to the movement of each foot, thinking: "lift" -- "forward" -- "down" -- "lift" -- "forward" -- "down." This alternation of breathing and walking practice may last sixteen hours each day for a period of six or more weeks.

Repulsiveness, Material Components, and Cemetery Meditations

The last of the body meditations are designed to overcome one's narcissistic infatuation for one's own body, to abandon unrealistic desires for immortality, and to destroy sensual lust. To achieve these ends two principles are employed. First is vividly and repeatedly impressing upon one's mind the temporary, changing, and compounded nature of the body. Secondly one establishes and persistently reinforces a series of negative associations to the usually sensual features of the body. This latter process employs the same principles as behaviour therapy and Pavlovian conditioning. However, Satipatthana differs from Pavlovian and behaviour therapy in that the conditioning is established by the meditator himself instead of an external agent.

Thus the Satipatthana Sutta continues:

> And further, monks, a monk reflects on this very body enveloped by the skin and full of manifold impurity, from the soles up, and from the top of the head hair down, thinking thus: "There are in this body hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, marrow, kidney, heart, liver, diaphragm, spleen, lungs, intestines, mesentery, gorge, faeces, bile, phlegm, pus, blood, sweat, fat, tears, grease, saliva, nasal mucus, synovial fluid, urine."
>
> Just as if there were a double-mouthed provision bag full of various kinds of grain such as hill paddy, paddy, green gram, cow-peas, sesamum, and husked rice, and a man with sound eyes, having opened that bag, were to take stock of the contents thus: "This is hill paddy, this is paddy, this is green gram, this is cow-pea, this is sesamum, this is husked rice." Just so, monks, a monk reflects on this very body, enveloped by the skin and full of manifold impurity, from the soles up, and from the top of the head hair down, thinking thus: "There are in this body hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, marrow, kidney, heart, liver, diaphragm, spleen, lungs, intestines, mesentery, gorge, faeces, bile, phlegm, pus, blood, sweat, fat, tears, grease, saliva, nasal mucus, synovial fluid, urine."
> And further, monks, a monk reflects on this very body however it be placed or disposed, by way of the material elements: "There are in this body the element of earth, the element of water, the element of fire (caloricity), the element of air."
> Just as if, monks, a clever cow-butcher or his apprentice, having slaughtered a cow and divided it into portions, should be sitting at the junction of four high roads, in the same way, a monk reflects on this very body, as it is placed or disposed, by way of the material elements: "There are in this body the elements of earth, water, fire and air."

This last paragraph is explained in the //Visuddhimagga//:

Just as the butcher, while feeding the cow, bringing it to the shambles, keeping it tied up after bringing it there, slaughtering it, and seeing it slaughtered and dead, does not lose the perception "cow" so long as he has not carved it up and divided it into parts; but when he has divided it up and is sitting there he loses the perception "cow" and the perception "meat" occurs; he does not think "I am selling cow" or "They are carrying cow away," but rather he thinks "I am selling meat" or "They are carrying meat away"; so too this monk, while still a foolish ordinary person -- both formerly as a layman and as one gone forth into homelessness -- , does not lose the perception "living being" or "man" or "person" so long as he does not, by resolution of the compact into elements, review this body, however placed, however disposed, as consisting of elements. But when he does review it as consisting of elements, he loses the perception "living being" and his mind establishes itself upon elements.[26]

The last of the body meditations are the nine cemetery meditations. Numbers 1, 2, 5, and 9 respectively are quoted here. The remaining five are similar and deal with intermediate stages of decomposition:

And further, monks, as if a monk sees a body dead, one, two or three days, swollen, blue and festering, thrown in the charnel ground, he then applies this perception to his own body thus: "Verily, also my own body is of the same nature; such it will become and will not escape it."

And further, monks, as if a monk sees a body thrown in the charnel ground, being eaten by crows, hawks, vultures, dogs, jackals or by different kinds of worms, he then applies this perception to his own body thus: "Verily, also my own body is of > the same nature; such it will become and will not escape it."

>
> And further, monks, as if a monk sees a body thrown in the charnel ground and reduced to a skeleton without flesh and blood, held together by the tendons ...
> And further, monks, as if a monk sees a body thrown in the charnel ground and reduced to bones, gone rotten and become dust, he then applies this perception to his own body thus: "Verily, also my own body is of the same nature; such it will become and will not escape it."

Similar meditations on the digestion and decomposition of food are listed in other sections of the Pali scriptures for the purpose of freeing the practitioner from undue cravings for food:

> When a monk devotes himself to this perception of repulsiveness in nutriment, his mind retreats, retracts and recoils from craving for flavours. He nourishes himself with nutriment without vanity....[27]

While these meditations are intended to eliminate passion and craving they carry the risk of making one morbid and depressed. Therefore the Buddha recommended:

> If in the contemplation of the body, bodily agitation, or mental lassitude or distraction should arise in the meditator, then he should turn his mind to a gladdening subject. Having done so, joy will arise in him.[28]

A cartoon in an American medical magazine shows four senior medical students standing together. Three are engaged in active conversation. Only the remaining one turns his head to take notice of a pretty nurse. The caption beneath the cartoon reads: "Guess which one has //not// done twelve pelvic examinations today." It is doubtful that many persons outside of the medical profession will appreciate the meaning, but to medical students and interns it speaks a reality. During his months of training in obstetrics and gynaecology the medical trainee must spend many hours engaged in examining and handling the most repulsive aspects of female genitals. As a result he finds the female body becoming less attractive and his sexual urges diminishing. During my own years as a medical student and intern, this observation was repeatedly confirmed by the comments of my co-workers, both married and single. As we have seen, the same principle is utilized in the sections of the Discourse on repulsiveness and the cemetery meditations.

Other aspects of scientific and medical training can produce results similar to those sought in the latter three body meditations. Chemistry, biochemistry, and histology foster an objective way of viewing the body which is virtually identical to the contemplation of elements. Anatomy, of course, is similar to the contemplation of repulsiveness. And in hospital training the persistent encounter with old age, debilitation, and death continuously reinforces the words of the cemetery meditations: "Verily, also my own body is of the same nature; such it will become and will not escape it." Similarly, in order to acquire a vivid mental image of the cemetery meditations, Buddhist monks occasionally visit graveyards to behold corpses in various stages of decay.[29] However, such experiences bear fruit only if one takes advantage of them and avoids the temptation to ignore and forget.

Discursive Meditations

Successful application of the Satipatthana meditations requires developed concentration, which in turn necessitates many hours of practice. There are, however, a variety of discursive meditations and related practices which the lay devotee can utilize to notable advantage. Some of these are not meditations in the strict sense of the word and are commonplace in virtually all religions.

A hymn, a poem, a passage from the Dhamma, or a passage from any inspiring literature can temporarily elevate the mind and serve to cultivate wholesome feelings. Many Buddhists make a habit of setting aside a few minutes each day to reflect upon the Teaching or to either read or recite from memory some favoured passage of the Dhammapada. For some, similar benefits may be gained from an evening stroll, a period of solitude in forest or desert, or a pause for contemplative relaxation in the midst of a hurried day. These latter three serve the added advantage of allowing one to reflect upon one's values and reappraise oneself.

Perhaps the most popular discursive meditation practised by Theravadin Buddhists is the meditation on love (//metta//). It is often recited in the morning in order to create a wholesome mood for the rest of the day.[30] There are several versions, one of which is as follows:

> My mind is temporarily pure, free from all impurities; free from lust, hatred and ignorance; free from all evil thoughts.
>
> My mind is pure and clean. Like a polished mirror is my stainless mind.
>
> As a clean and empty vessel is filled with pure water I now fill my clean heart and pure mind with peaceful and sublime thoughts of boundless love, overflowing compassion, sympathetic joy, and perfect equanimity.
>
> I have now washed my mind and heart of anger, ill will, cruelty, violence, jealousy, envy, passion, and aversion.
>
> May I be well and happy!
>
> May I be free from suffering, disease, grief, worry, and anger!
>
> May I be strong, self-confident, healthy, and peaceful!
> Now I charge every particle of my system, from head to foot, with thoughts of boundless love and compassion. I am the embodiment of love and compassion. My whole body is saturated with love and compassion. I am a stronghold, a fortress of love and compassion.

What I have gained I now give unto others.

Think of all your near and dear ones at home, individually or collectively, and fill them with thoughts of loving-kindness and wish them peace and happiness, repeating, "May all beings be well and happy!" Then think of all seen and unseen beings, living near and far, men, women, animals and all living beings, in the East, West, North, South, above and below, and radiate boundless loving-kindness, without any enmity or obstruction, towards all, irrespective of class, creed, colour or sex.

Think that all are your brothers and sisters, fellow-beings in the ocean of life. You identify yourself with all. You are one with all.

Repeat ten times -- //May all be well and happy// -- and wish them all peace and happiness.[31]

Another useful meditation for laymen is as follows:

May I be generous and helpful!
May I be well-disciplined and refined in manners!
May I be pure and clean in all my dealings!
May my thoughts, words and deeds be pure!
May I not be selfish and self-possessive but selfless and disinterested!
May I be able to sacrifice my pleasures for the sake of others!
May I be wise and be able to see things as they truly are!
May I see the light of Truth and lead others from darkness to light!
May I be enlightened and be able to enlighten others!
May I be able to give the benefit of my knowledge to others!
May I be energetic, vigorous, and persevering!
May I strive diligently until I achieve my goal!
May I be fearless in facing dangers and courageously surmount all obstacles!

> May I be able to serve others to the best of my ability!
> May I be ever patient!
> May I be able to bear and forbear the wrongs of others!
> May I ever be tolerant and see the good and beautiful in all!
> May I ever be truthful and honest!
> May I ever be kind, friendly, and compassionate!
> May I be able to regard all as my brothers and sisters and be one with all!
> May I ever be calm, serene, unruffled, and peaceful!
> May I gain a balanced mind!
> May I have perfect equanimity![32]

In the mind of a devout Buddhist, Gotama Buddha symbolizes the embodiment of one's highest spiritual ideals. Consequently, the Buddha is often taken as a meditation subject.

> As long as (the meditator) recollects the special qualities of the Buddha in this way, "For this and this reason the Blessed One is accomplished, ... for this and this reason he is blessed," then on that occasion his mind is not obsessed by greed, or obsessed by hate, or obsessed by delusion; his mind has rectitude on that occasion, being inspired by the Perfect One.[33]

> When a noble disciple contemplates upon the Enlightened One, at that time his mind is not enwrapped by lust nor by hatred nor by delusion and at that time his mind is rightly directed towards the Tathagata. And with a rightly directed mind the noble disciple gains enthusiasm for the goal, enthusiasm for the Dhamma, gains the delight derived from the Dhamma. In him thus delighted, joy arises; to one joyfully minded, body and mind become calm; calmed in body and mind, he feels at ease; and if at ease, the mind finds concentration.[34]

The hazard in meditating on the Buddha, however, is that the unsophisticated meditator may not be aware of the psychological reasons for this exercise. In such a case the practice is likely to become a devotional one similar to those of non-Buddhist religions.

Mindfulness of Feelings, Consciousness, and Mental Objects

Some time ago I became acquainted with a Caucasian Buddhist who for several years had made a daily practice of meditating on love. He confided that he had chosen this meditation subject because he was prone to frequent outbreaks of anger and chronic resentment; a "hate problem" he termed it. But despite years of meditation, the hatred had not diminished; the meditation had failed. Why? As our acquaintance broadened the answer became apparent. My friend had several poorly-concealed intellectual and emotional deficiencies. He never once revealed that he acknowledged these; on the contrary, he displayed frequent attempts to bolster his self-image. Such attempts were invariably doomed to frustration, especially when his accomplishments and social poise were contrasted with those of others. By reacting with anger towards others he avoided the unpleasantry of looking at himself. In other words, his anger was a psychological defense through which he sought to maintain an illusion of self-esteem. Thus unconsciously he did not wish to relinquish his anger. To do so would be too painful, and to attack the anger by meditating on love was futile, for anger was only a symptom. The real problem lay much deeper.

To cure such hatred requires three things. First one must become aware of the existence of one's inadequacies and their accompanying humiliations; in other words, what is unconscious must become conscious. Second one must totally confront such unpleasant feelings and acknowledge them in their entirety. And finally one must relinquish the egotistical desire for self-exaltation. This last requirement is best achieved by objectively analyzing the illusion of self and gaining full appreciation for the changing and compounded nature of the personality. In other words, one must acquire insight of both types discussed above under the goals of meditation. How can this be achieved?

Awareness of unconscious feelings is rarely obtained through logical deductions or rational explanations. A person who harbours these feelings will either refuse to believe what he is told or will come to accept it only as so much factual information devoid of emotional significance. An excellent illustration is the case of a forty-year-old woman who sought psychiatric help for severe feelings of fear, guilt, and depression. On examining her case it became apparent that her problem was largely due to repressed feelings of hatred for her mother, a very dominating and selfish woman. After much discussion the patient finally deduced that she indeed did hate her mother, and for the next two months she spoke knowingly and learnedly about her repressed hatred and resultant symptoms. Yet she improved not one bit. Then one day she entered the office shaking with rage and cried, "God, I hate that witch!" There was never a more vivid example of the difference between knowing and experiencing. Improvement quickly followed.

This example is typical of many psychiatric case histories. One sees patients who speak in the most erudite manner about Freud and Jung and adeptly employ psychiatric terminology. Yet this intellectual verbiage is often a subtle defense against facing their true feelings. Conversely, many unsophisticated and unlearned patients are quick to achieve insight and make rapid progress. Consequently, the skilful psychiatrist makes limited use of technical jargon and theoretical concepts. He asks questions often but answers few. This same technique is employed in Burmese and Zen meditation centers. The student is discouraged from making philosophical inquiries and is told: "Pursue your meditation, and soon you will see."[35]

> You may, Ananda, also keep in mind this marvellous and wonderful quality of the Tathagata (the Buddha): knowingly arise feelings in the Tathagata, knowingly they continue, knowingly they cease; knowingly arise perceptions in the Tathagata, knowingly they continue, knowingly they cease; knowingly arise thoughts in the Tathagata, knowingly they continue, knowingly they cease. This, Ananda, you may also keep in mind as a marvellous and wonderful quality of the Tathagata.[36]

In his earlier years Sigmund Freud experimented with hypnosis. He found it a useful tool in revealing unconscious feelings and conflicts to the //therapist//, but it was of little value to the patient. The reason was that hypnotic trance precluded the patient from consciously confronting and resolving his problems. Therefore, Freud abandoned hypnosis in preference to the now standard procedures of psychiatry and psycho-analysis. These same findings and conclusions have often been repeated by later researchers and clinicians. Similarly, the Buddha rejected the use of trance states so common in yogic practice and developed a means by which people can acquire insight without the aid of a therapist or psychedelic drugs. Two approaches are employed.

The easier approach to insight is one which both monks and laymen can use regardless of meditative development. It consists in developing the habit of reflecting on one's feelings from time to time and detecting the motives which produce seemingly spontaneous words and deeds. "Why did I say that?" "Why am I tense when I meet so and so?" "I find myself disliking such and such a character in this novel. Why is that? Of whom does he remind me?"

For those who have progressed in the breathing meditation or made similar progress at quieting the mind, unconscious feelings become more readily accessible. As one begins to shut out sensory distractions and halt discursive thinking, more subtle sensations come into awareness. At first there may be only a vague feeling of anxiety, some unexplained sense of guilt, or a feeling of anger. Without recourse to verbal whys or hows and avoiding any speculative conjecture the meditator directs full attention to the feeling alone. He brings only the feeling itself into full awareness and allows no interfering thoughts, though later he will benefit by reflecting on it in a contemplative manner. It is at this point that repressed memories and emotional conflicts may come into awareness. Here also, meditation can be potentially dangerous for those whose personality structures are loosely constituted or who have repressed emotional problems of severe intensity. Usually, however, in these latter instances one's unconscious defenses will intervene and the meditator will terminate the practice because he feels anxious, or "can't concentrate," or "just quit because I felt like it."

Thus the last three sections of the Satipatthana Sutta read as follows:

//Mindfulness of feelings// -- the second of the four foundations of mindfulness:

> Herein, monks, a monk when experiencing a pleasant feeling knows, "I experience a pleasant feeling"; when experiencing a painful feeling, he knows, "I experience a painful feeling"; when experiencing a neutral feeling, he knows, "I experience a neutral feeling....

//Mindfulness of consciousness// -- the third of the four foundations of mindfulness:

> Herein, monks, a monk knows the consciousness with lust, as with lust; the consciousness without lust, as without lust; the consciousness with hate, as with hate; the consciousness without hate, as without hate; the consciousness with ignorance, as with ignorance; the consciousness without ignorance, as without ignorance; the shrunken (i.e. rigid and indolent) state of consciousness as the shrunken state; the distracted (i.e. restless) state of consciousness as the distracted state; the developed state of consciousness as the developed state; the undeveloped state of consciousness as the undeveloped state....

//Mindfulness of mental objects// -- the fourth of the four foundations of mindfulness:

> Herein, monks, when sense-desire is present, a monk knows, "There is sense-desire in me," or when sense-desire is not present, he knows, "There is no sense-desire in me." He knows how the arising of the non-arisen sense-desire comes to be; he knows how the abandoning of the arisen sense-desire comes to be; and he knows how the non-arising in the future of the abandoned sense-desire comes to be.

> When anger is present, he knows, "There is anger in me."... (as above for sense-desire) ... When sloth and torpor are present ... When agitation and worry are present ... When doubt is present ... (as above)."
> Herein, monks, when the enlightenment-factor of mindfulness is present, the monk knows, "The enlightenment-factor of mindfulness is in me," or when the enlightenment-factor of mindfulness is absent, he knows, "The enlightenment-factor of mindfulness is not in me"; and he knows how the arising of the non-arisen enlightenment-factor of mindfulness comes to be; and how the perfection in the development of the arisen enlightenment-factor of mindfulness comes to be.

This paragraph on mindfulness is then repeated in the same wording for the remaining six enlightenment-factors, i.e. investigation of reality, energy, happiness, tranquillity, concentration, and equanimity. These seven bear the title "enlightenment-factors" as they are said to be the essential states for the realization of Nibbana.

Leaving the Satipatthana Sutta for a moment, we note another of the Buddha's sayings:

> "Is there a way, monks, by which a monk without recourse to faith, to cherished opinions, to tradition, to specious reasoning, to the approval of views pondered upon, may declare the Final Knowledge (of Sainthood)?... There is such a way, O monks. And which is it? Herein, monks, a monk has seen a form with his eyes, and if greed, hate or delusion are in him, he knows: 'There is in me greed, hate, delusion'; and if greed, hate or delusion are not in him, he knows: 'There is no greed, hate, delusion in me.' Further, monks, a monk has heard a sound, smelled an odour, tasted a flavour, felt a tactile sensation, cognized a mental object (idea), and if greed, hate or delusion are in him, he knows: 'There is in me greed, hate, delusion'; and if greed, hate or delusion are not in him, he knows: 'There is in me no greed, hate, delusion.' And if he thus knows, O monks, are these ideas such as to be known by recourse to faith, to cherished opinions, to tradition, to specious reasoning, to the approval of views pondered upon?"

"Certainly not, Lord."

"Are these not rather ideas to be known after wisely realizing them by experience?"

"That is so, Lord."

"This, monks, is a way by which a monk, without recourse to faith, to cherished opinions, to tradition, to specious reasoning, to the approval of views pondered upon, may declare the Final Knowledge (of Sainthood)."[37]

Thus far we have discussed how one achieves insight as the first step towards eliminating unwholesome feelings and motivations. Following insight one must totally confront these newly discovered feelings and acknowledge them fully and impartially. One must see their true nature devoid of any emotional reactions (such as guilt or craving) and devoid of preconceived notions about their good or evil qualities. In other words, complete attention is focused on the feeling itself in order that one may examine it objectively in its naked reality, free of any cultural and personal assumptions as to its desirability. This achievement results from the Satipatthana practices described above.[38]

As an example, in a typical case of anger one is cognizant of being angry, yet a much greater amount of attention is directed outward. Most typically the angry mind quickly perceives and dwells upon the objectionable and offensive features of some other person (or persons). And in so doing indignation, resentment, and anger increase. These objectionable features of the other person may be fancied, exaggerated, or real, but in any case, were it not for the anger such preoccupations would not have arisen. The Buddhist approach is to turn attention to the real problem -- the anger. One reflects, "I am angry."..."I am doing this because I am angry."..."I am having these thoughts because I am angry." In so doing one avoids dwelling on alleged injustices, etc., and thereby does not intensify the hatred. This reflection continues, "This is anger." ... "It is real; it is intense." ... "It is a feeling." ... "It has no reality outside of my own consciousness." ... "Like all feelings, it will soon diminish." ... "I experience it but am not compelled to act on it." With practice one finds that though anger still arises, its effect is diminished. Its influence is no longer as strong. In the case of painful emotions, such as humiliation, it is advantageous to also reflect, "This is most painful." ... "I do not like it; but I can confront it." ... "I can endure it." ... "Even though it is unpleasant, I can tolerate it." In instances of greed and passion it is often fruitful to consider "Is this truly pleasurable?" ... "Is it rewarding?" ... "Am I now happy?"

It should be noted that this important technique can also be employed in the course of daily living without unusual powers of concentration or formal meditation practice.

In the words of the Buddha:

> There are three kinds of feeling, O monks: pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling, and neutral feeling. For the full understanding of these three kinds of feelings, O monks, the four foundations of mindfulness should be cultivated.[39]
> In pleasant feelings, monks, the inclination to greed should be given up; in unpleasant feelings the inclination to aversion should be given up; in neutral feelings the inclination to ignorance should be given up. If a monk has given up in pleasant feelings the inclination to greed, in unpleasant feelings the inclination to aversion, and in neutral feelings the inclination to ignorance, then he is called one who is free of (unsalutary) inclinations, one who sees clearly. He has cut off cravings, sundered the fetters, and through the destruction of conceit, has made an end of suffering.

> If one feels joy, but knows not feeling's nature,
> Bent towards greed, he will not find deliverance.

If one feels pain, but knows not feeling's nature,
Bent towards hate, he will not find deliverance.
And even neutral feeling which as peaceful
The Lord of Wisdom has proclaimed,
If, in attachment, he should cling to it, this Will not set free him from the round of ill.
But if a monk is ardent and does not neglect
To practise mindfulness and comprehension clear,
The nature of all feelings will he penetrate.
And having done so, in this very life
Will he be free from cankers, from all taints.
Mature in knowledge, firm in Dhamma's ways,
When once his life-span ends, his body breaks,
All measure and concepts will be transcended.[40]

After getting rid of sensual cravings and after uncovering, confronting, and relinquishing unwholesome emotions, there remains only one fetter to be resolved. This is narcissism, the infatuation for one's self, which results in egotism, and an endless quest for social recognition and self-exaltation. Perpetuating this fetter is the illusion that one has a true or unchanging self, the "real me." In reality there is no such entity; instead there are only feelings, sensations, and emotions, and once we gain full appreciation of this fact, once it becomes a living reality to us, narcissism diminishes. Among the Buddha's teachings are numerous passages like the following:

There is no corporeality, no feeling, no perception, no mental formations, no consciousness that is permanent, enduring and lasting, and that, not subject to any change, will eternally remain the same. If there existed such an ego that is permanent, enduring and lasting, and not subject to any change, then the holy life leading to the complete extinction of suffering will not be possible.[41]

Better it would be to consider the body as the ego rather than the mind. And why? Because this body may last for ten, twenty, thirty, forty or fifty years, even for a hundred years and more. But that which is called "mind, consciousness, thinking," arises > continuously, during day and night, as one thing, and as something different again it vanishes.[42]

Such statements, however, are merely philosophical arguments through which one may intellectually accept this fact. Only by experiencing it as a living reality and by an impartial analysis of the self do we relinquish egotism. Thus in the Satipatthana Sutta, after each of the six body meditations and after each of the meditations on feeling, consciousness, and mental objects, the following passage occurs. (Quoted here is the section on feelings. The words "body," "consciousness," and "mental objects" are substituted for the word "feelings" in their respective sections of the sutta.)

> Thus he lives contemplating feelings in himself, or he lives contemplating feelings in other persons, or he lives contemplating feelings both in himself and in others. He lives contemplating origination-factors in feelings, or he lives contemplating dissolution-factors in feelings, or he lives contemplating origination-and-dissolution factors in feelings. Or his mindfulness is established with the thought, "Feeling exists," to the extent necessary just for knowledge and mindfulness, and he lives independent, and clings to nothing in the world. Thus, monks, a monk lives contemplating feelings.

In the instance of anger, one would reflect: "This is anger." ... "It is a feeling." ... "I do not identify with it." ... "It will eventually be replaced by another feeling, which in turn will be replaced by still another." ... "I am a composite of various feelings; a changing aggregate of attitudes, values, and thoughts; no one of which is permanent." ... "There is no eternal I." As such objectivity and detachment increases, anger diminishes, for no longer is there an ego to be defended and no self which can be offended.

Except for a concluding section on the Four Noble Truths (see above, p.3), we have now discussed all but two portions of the Satipatthana Sutta. These remaining two are included under the section on mental objects and are primarily intended to free one from sensual craving and the illusion of self:

> Herein, monks, a monk thinks: "Thus is material form; thus is the arising of material form; and thus is the disappearance of material form. Thus is feeling; thus is the arising of feeling; and thus is the disappearance of feeling. Thus is perception; thus is the arising of perception; and thus is the disappearance of perception. Thus are mental formations (i.e. thoughts); thus is the arising of mental formations; and thus is the disappearance of mental formations. Thus is consciousness; thus is the arising of consciousness; and thus is the disappearance of consciousness."
> Herein, monks, a monk knows the eye and visual forms, and the fetter that arises dependent on both; he knows how the arising of the non-arisen fetter comes to be; he knows how the abandoning of the arisen fetter comes to be; and he knows how the non-arising in the future of the abandoned fetter comes to be.

This latter passage is repeated five times with "ear and sound," "nose and smells," "tongue and flavours," "body and tactual objects," and "mind and mental objects" respectively substituted where "eye and visual forms" appears above.

We have thus completed the Satipatthana Sutta. In summary, it first prescribes mindfulness of breathing as a technique for quieting the mind and developing concentration. This same heightened awareness is then developed for all voluntary physical actions. Next are the meditations on repulsiveness, elements, and death, which are intended to free one from bodily attachment and lust; this is done by contemplating the temporary and changing nature of the body and by developing negative and unpleasant associations. The remaining three sections enable the practitioner to become fully aware of his thoughts, feelings, and emotions and to confront them impartially in their true nature. With each of these exercises, one also objectively notes that each facet of his own mind and body is temporary, compounded, and changing, and therefore there exists no immortal soul, unchanging essence, or true self.

One important fact should be noted. //Neither in the Satipatthana Sutta nor in any of the other seven steps of the Eightfold Path is advocated the denial or suppression of feelings//. It is a widely spread and inaccurate belief that Theravada Buddhism attempts to destroy evil thoughts by forcing them from the mind. Suppression of undesirable thoughts is advocated in only a few parts of the Pali Canon and is to be used only in special cases when other measures fail.[43]

In southern Asia it is becoming a common practice for both monks and laymen to enter a meditation centre for periods of from six to twelve weeks. Here one dons the white robe of an //upasaka// and is removed from all social contacts and material possessions. Previous social status and identity soon come to have little meaning, thus minimizing the effect of established habits and adaptations and thereby enhancing the opportunities for personality growth. The food is palatable but bland, and one eats and sleeps in moderation according to a strict schedule, and even eating and dressing become routine meditation practices. Virtually every waking moment is dedicated to meditation. Here progress is made at a rate impossible to achieve by setting aside an hour or two in the midst of a busy day. After his stay is over, the layman returns to family life and continues his daily one-hour practice. However, not all meditation centres are of high quality. Many are lax; a few are corrupt, and a few teach unorthodox meditations which are not truly Buddhist. Thus a person seeking entry should first make inquiries and would do well to avoid centres which make an effort to recruit Westerners for the sake of publicity and prestige. Satipatthana meditation centres exist in North America, and courses are given in England.

The Eighth Step

The last step of the Noble Eightfold Path is termed right concentration and concerns the attainment of the four absorptions or //jhanas//. These states are achieved by an extreme degree of concentration and mental quietude beyond that usually sought through mindfulness of breathing. Yet, unlike Satipatthana, the jhanas are not a prerequisite to Enlightenment. Some teachers say one may obtain Nibbana without reaching the absorptions, and they alone will not produce Nibbana. Also, there is the danger of one becoming enamoured with them and not striving for further progress. However, achieving the jhanas can facilitate one's progress.[44]

In these states all visual, tactile, auditory, and other sense impressions have ceased, while the mind remains alert and fully awake. The first jhana is described as having five qualities absent and five present. Absent are lust, anger, sloth, agitation, and doubt. Present are a mild degree of conceptual thought, a mild degree of discursive thinking, rapture, happiness, and concentration. With the removal of all conceptual thought and discursive thinking one enters the second jhana, which has the qualities of concentration, rapture, and happiness. Then with the abandonment of rapture, one enters the third jhana in which only equanimous happiness and concentration remain. The distinctive factors of the fourth absorption are equanimity and concentration. This last jhana is realized after giving up all joy and sorrow and is described as a state beyond pleasure and pain.[45]

The jhanas are obtained by mindfulness of breathing with a steady, progressive quieting of the breath.[46] They may also be realized through the kasina meditations and meditating on equanimity.[47]

At this point it is interesting to speculate on the phenomena of parapsychology. Despite the fraudulent and careless investigations which have been done in psychical research, there still remains a sizable number of reliable and carefully controlled studies (especially in England) which have demonstrated that people do, indeed, possess the faculties of telepathy, clairvoyance, and precognition (i.e. respectively, the abilities to read another's thoughts, to see or know distant happenings beyond the range of normal vision, and to foretell future events). In addition some researchers claim to have established the existence of psychokinesis, the power of mind over matter, but the evidence for psychokinesis is inconclusive and most experiments have failed to demonstrate its validity. Of those parapsychology subjects who have been tested to date, even the best guess incorrectly as often as correctly and are unable to determine which of their guesses are correct. That is, while being tested, the ESP subject is unable to distinguish between guesses and true extra-sensory information.[48] One might wonder if the process of reducing sensory impressions and stilling discursive thoughts would enhance these psychic abilities.

According to the Pali texts there are five psychical powers which can be obtained through meditation. These five include psychokinesis, telepathy, and clairvoyance, plus two others. The additional two are the "divine ear" or clairaudience (the auditory counterpart of clairvoyance) and the ability to recall past lives.[49] Precognition itself is not listed among these but is mentioned in other sections of the Tipitaka. Reliable use of these powers is allegedly possessed only by those who have achieved the four jhanas either with or without Nibbana.[50] Thus, like more worldly talents, Nibbana alone does not produce them.[51]

The most important consideration, however, is that Buddhism places very little emphasis on paranormal phenomena and regards them as by-products of spiritual development rather than goals. In fact, the novice is cautioned against experimenting with them, since they distract from one's true goals and in some cases can be obstructive or even dangerous.[52]

> Supernormal powers are the supernormal powers of the ordinary man. They are hard to maintain, like a prone infant or like a baby hare, and the slightest thing breaks them. But they are an impediment for insight, not for concentration, since they are obtainable through concentration. So the supernormal powers are an impediment that should be severed by one who seeks insight.[53]

Other Forms of Meditation

The Satipatthana exercises are by far the most valuable and widely practised of all the Theravada meditations. There are, however, a total of forty meditation subjects listed in the //Visuddhimagga// including those already mentioned, i.e. Satipatthana practices and meditations on love, equanimity, repulsiveness of food, and the Buddha. The remaining subjects are the Dhamma, the Order of Monks, virtue, generosity, devas, peace, compassion, gladness, boundless space, boundless consciousness, nothingness, the base of neither perception nor non-perception, and the ten kasinas. Each of these subjects is intended for specific individual needs, and one should not attempt to undertake all forty. To do so would only dilute one's energies and retard progress.

A //kasina// is an object (such as a clay disk, a flame, or colour) which the practitioner looks at from a distance of about four feet. The eyes are alternately opened and closed until one has acquired a mental image of the object which is as vivid as the real one.[54] The ten kasina meditations develop the jhanas and do not enhance insight.

Meditation is not an exclusively Buddhist tradition. It is equally important in the Hindu religion and because the two schools employ similar techniques, they are often confused. Thus a comparison is warranted. Both advocate preparatory moral discipline, moderation in eating, quieting the mind, and abolition of selfish desires. The postures are similar, and the breathing meditation is practised by many yogis. Here, however, the similarities cease. Buddhism is concerned with the empirical phenomena of conscious experience, and thus its meditations are psychologically oriented. Hinduism, on the other hand, is mystically, religiously, and metaphysically inclined. Yogic meditation, therefore, has devotional aspects often including prayer. While Buddhism emphasizes motivations and insight, Hinduism speaks of Infinite Consciousness, Cosmic Reality, and oneness with God. To the Hindu, freedom from hatred is not so much an end in itself as it is a step towards Immortality. The following typifies Hindu writings:

> Retire into a solitary room. Close your eyes. Have deep silent meditation. Feel his (God's) presence. Repeat His name OM with fervour, joy and love. Fill your heart with love. Destroy the Sankalpas, thoughts, whims, fancies, and desires when they arise from the surface of the mind. Withdraw the wandering mind and fix it upon the Lord. Now, Nishta, meditation will become deep and intense. Do not open your eyes. Do not stir from your seat. Merge in Him. Dive deep into the innermost recesses of the heart. Plunge into the shining Atma (Soul) within. Drink the nectar of Immortality. Enjoy the silence now. I shall leave you there alone. Nectar's son, Rejoice, Rejoice! Peace, Peace! Silence, Silence! Glory, Glory![55]

Another important difference concerns the visions that occur during meditation. The Buddhist regards these as psychological phenomena to be dealt with in the same way as distracting thoughts. The Hindu often interprets them as psychic experiences indicative of spiritual development. In the words of Swami Sivananda:

> Sometimes Devatas (gods), Rishis (sages), Nitya Siddhas will appear in meditation. Receive them with honour. Bow to them. Get advice from them. They appear before you to help and give you encouragement.[56]

A few passages in the Tao-Te-Ching suggest that the Chinese mystics discovered meditation independently of Buddhist and Hindu traditions:

> Can you govern your animal soul, hold to the One and never depart from it?
> Can you throttle your breath, down to the softness of breath in a child?
> Can you purify your mystic vision and wash it until it is spotless? (v.10)
> Stop your senses,
> Close the doors;
> Let sharp things be blunted,

Tangles resolved,
The light tempered
And turmoil subdued;
For this is mystic unity
In which the Wise Man is moved Neither by affection
Nor yet by estrangement
Or profit or loss
Or honor or shame.
Accordingly, by all the world,
He is held highest. (v. 56)

To know that you are ignorant is best;
To know what you do not, is a disease;
But if you recognize the malady
Of mind for what it is, then that is health.
The Wise Man has indeed a healthy mind;
He sees an aberration as it is
And for that reason never will be ill. (v. 71)[57]

The exact nature of early Taoist meditation will probably remain unknown, since later Taoism has intermingled with Mahayana Buddhism.

Mahayana Buddhist meditations include all the above mentioned Theravada practices plus others. The division of Mahayana into numerous and varied sects precludes any general statement about its practices. In some forms it bears similarities to Hinduism by virtue of devotional emphasis and prayer. In other schools this similarity is seen in the Mahayana concepts of Universal Mind, the Void, and Buddha Nature, which sometimes take precedence over the Theravada concerns of greed, hatred, and delusion. The curing of physical illness and the flow of spiritual forces through the body are other features of certain Mahayana practices:

Vibrations (during meditation) show the free passage of the vital principle. As it passes through the stomach and intestines, it vibrates when the belly is empty. But when the belly is full, it > ceases to vibrate. The breath reaches the lower belly more easily when the latter is full. Vibrations are not accidental but come from the vital principle circulating in the belly. As time passes, when your meditation is more effective and the vital principle flows freely, then these vibrations will cease.[58]

Of all the Mahayana schools, Zen places the greatest emphasis upon meditation. Zen practice is much like Theravada. It focuses on quieting the mind and shuns conceptual thinking in preference to direct experience. The postures are also similar, and the initial Zen practice usually involves attention to breathing. It does not include as wide a variety of different techniques. Zen places greater emphasis on the details of correct posture and, especially in the Soto school, contrasts with Theravada by preferring group meditation to individual practice. In order to cultivate a suitable state of mind, Zen meditation is often followed by chanting and gongs.

Perhaps the most significant difference is that, as compared to Theravada, Zen makes little mention of the need and means of dealing with motives, feelings, and emotions. It lays great emphasis upon freeing oneself from intellectualizing and conceptualizing in one's quest of "the Ultimate." But at the same time it offers scant advice on the means by which one overcomes unwholesome impulses or confronts mental hindrances that are emotional or motivational in origin.

Scientific Evaluations of Meditation

The Venerable Anuruddha, a disciple of the Buddha, once became ill with a painful disease. On that occasion several of the monks visited him and inquired:

> What might be the state of mind dwelling in which painful bodily sensations are unable to perturb the mind of the Venerable Anuruddha?

He replied:

> It is a state of mind, brethren, that is firmly grounded in the four foundations of mindfulness; and due to that, painful bodily sensations cannot perturb my mind.[59]

Throughout Buddhist history, there have been numerous other testimonies as to the benefits of Satipatthana. Yet personal testimonies and case histories are subjective and prone to distortion. The reader may well wonder what, if any, scientific studies have been conducted. To date there are two areas of investigation which have given some evidence as to the benefits of meditation.

//Sensory Deprivation//

The first scientific evidence does not involve meditation per se, but concerns an experimental situation which has some similarities to meditation practice. This is sensory deprivation, which has been actively studied since 1951. There are two types of sensory deprivation. One reduces sensory input by placing the experimental subject in a totally dark, soundproof room. His hands are encased in soft cotton; the temperature is constant and mild, and he lies on a soft mattress. The other type does not reduce sensory input per se, but does diminish perception. In this latter case the subject wears opaque goggles so that he sees only a diffuse white with no forms or colours. A constant monotonous noise is generated, and no other sounds are heard. Approximately the same results are obtained in either type of experiment. In both kinds the subject lies relatively motionless; he is free to think or sleep as he pleases and may terminate the session if he so desires. Experiments have lasted from four hours to five days.[60]

The lack of practice and lack of any attempt at mental discipline makes sensory deprivation a passive procedure notably different from meditation. However, both meditation and sensory deprivation involve a temporary withdrawal from external stimuli without loss of consciousness, and thus a comparison is warranted.

Perhaps the most characteristic feature of sensory deprivation research to date is the great discrepancies in the findings of different researchers. For example, some studies have shown it to impair learning, while others find that learning is enhanced.61 Most of the early studies reported that the great majority (in some cases all) of experimental subjects had strong visual and sometimes auditory hallucinations beginning from twenty minutes to seventy hours after entering the experiment. Other researchers, however, reported very few hallucinations. Suggestion is a partial, though not total, explanation for this difference in frequency of hallucinations. One study found that under identical sensory deprivation conditions a group of subjects which was told that hallucinations were frequent and normal had over three times more than an identical group which was given no such information.62 This no doubt explains many of the psychic experiences of those yogi devotees who seek visions while meditating in isolation.

Recent studies have indicated that the emotional atmosphere created by the experimenters plus the subject's attitudes, knowledge, and expectations may have greater effect on the results of the experiment than do the physical aspects of sensory deprivation.63 Regarding meditation, this fact suggests the importance of moral, intellectual, and environmental preparation. It also suggests the importance of taking a few moments before meditation to create a wholesome frame of mind.

What is most significant for the purpose of this writing, however, is whether or not sensory deprivation and its accompanying social isolation facilitate awareness of one's inner emotional conflicts and thereby facilitate personality growth. Several studies have indicated that such is the case. Most significant was an experiment conducted on thirty white male psychiatric patients in Richmond, Virginia. The group consisted of approximately equal numbers of neurotics, schizophrenics, and character disorders, and all were subjected to a maximum six hours of sensory deprivation. Each subject was given a battery of psychological tests the day before the experiment, and the same tests were repeated the day after and again one week later. The tests rated the subjects on twenty items such as anxiety, depression, hostility, memory deficit, disorganized thinking, etc. It was found that on each of the twenty items some subjects improved, some worsened and some revealed no change. However, the desirable changes outnumbered the undesirable ones by a ratio of two to one, and one week after the experiment most of the beneficial changes were found to have persisted while the undesirable ones had mostly subsided. Some subjects showed no desirable changes on any of the twenty items; others revealed as many as thirteen. The average subject improved on four of the twenty items and worsened on two. The experimenters also reported that the subjects displayed "increased awareness of inner conflicts and anxieties, and heightened perception of the fact that their difficulties stemmed from inner rather than outer factors.... A second major change observed was a less rigid utilization of repressive and inhibitory defenses. The reduction of incoming stimulation led to recall and verbalization of previously forgotten experiences in many instances. For some subjects this recall was anxiety-inducing...."[64]

Other studies have supported this finding that short term sensory deprivation is psychologically beneficial. (Deprivation of a day or more is likely to be detrimental.) However, other carefully conducted investigations have found no such improvements,[65] and therefore further studies are indicated before any definite conclusions can be made about the therapeutic value of sensory deprivation.

//Electroencephalographic Analysis of Meditation//

In 1963 a fascinating and unique report on Zen meditation was presented by Dr. Akira Kasamatsu and Dr. Tomio Hirai of the Department of Neuro-Psychiatry, Tokyo University. It contained the results of a ten-year study of the brain wave or electroencephalographic (EEG) tracings of Zen masters.[66,67]

The EEG tracings revealed that about ninety seconds after an accomplished Zen practitioner begins meditation, a rhythmic slowing in the brain wave pattern known as alpha waves occurs. This slowing occurs //with eyes open// and progresses with meditation, and after thirty minutes one finds rhythmic alpha waves of seven or eight per second. This effect persists for some minutes after meditation. What is most significant is that this EEG pattern is notably different from those of sleep, normal waking consciousness, and hypnotic trance, and is unusual in persons who have not made considerable progress in meditation. In other words, it suggests an unusual mental state; though from the subjective reports of the practitioners, it does not appear to be a unique or highly unusual conscious experience. It was also found that a Zen master's evaluation of the amount of progress another practitioner had made correlated directly with the latter's EEG changes.

Another finding of the same study concerned what is called alpha blocking and habituation. To understand these phenomena let us imagine that a person who is reading quietly is suddenly interrupted by a loud noise. For a few seconds his attention is diverted from the reading to the noise. If the same sound is then repeated a few seconds later his attention will again be diverted, only not as strongly nor for as long a time. If the sound is then repeated at regular intervals, the person will continue reading and become oblivious to the sound. A normal subject with closed eyes produces alpha waves on an EEG tracing. An auditory stimulation, such as a loud noise, normally obliterates alpha waves for seven seconds or more; this is termed alpha blocking. In a Zen master the alpha blocking produced by the first noise lasts only two seconds. If the noise is repeated at 15 second intervals, we find that in the normal subject there is virtually no alpha blocking remaining by the fifth successive noise. This diminution of alpha blocking is termed habituation and persists in normal subjects for as long as the noise continues at regular and frequent intervals. In the Zen master, however, no habituation is seen. His alpha blocking lasts two seconds with the first sound, two seconds with the fifth sound, and two seconds with the twentieth sound. This implies that the Zen master has a greater awareness of his environment as the paradoxical result of meditative concentration. One master described such a state of mind as that of noticing every person he sees on the street but of not looking back with emotional lingering.

The Social Fruits of Meditation

Through science, technology, and social organization Western man has built a civilization of unprecedented wealth and grandeur. Yet despite this mastery of his environment, he has given little thought to mastery of himself. In fact, his newly-acquired wealth and leisure have heightened his sensuality and weakened his self-discipline. It becomes increasingly apparent, however, that a stable and prosperous democracy can endure only so long as we have intelligent, self-disciplined, and properly motivated citizens; legislation and education alone will not ensure this. Buddhism presents a technique by which this can be obtained, but the responsibility rests with each individual. No one can cure our neuroses and strengthen our characters except ourselves.

In the Sumbha country in the town of Sedaka the Buddha once said:

> "I shall protect myself," in that way the foundations of mindfulness should be practised. "I shall protect others," in that way the foundations of mindfulness should be practised. Protecting oneself one protects others; protecting others one protects oneself. And how does one, in protecting oneself, protect others? By the repeated and frequent practice of meditation. And how does one, in protecting others, protect oneself? By patience and forbearance, by a non-violent and harmless life, by loving-kindness and compassion. "I shall protect myself," in that way the foundations of mindfulness should be practised. "I shall protect others," in that way the foundations of mindfulness should be practised. Protecting oneself, one protects others; protecting others, one protects oneself.[68]

APPENDIX

Some Observations and Suggestions for Insight Meditation

The preceding was written in 1964 with a few minor revisions and additions made in the latter part of 1965. Now, at the start of 1972 and after six years in Thailand, it seems befitting that I review my own words. For the past years have not only added to my own experience with meditation, they have also brought me into close and prolonged contact (often close friendships) with other meditation practitioners many of whom are more dedicated, more skilful, and more experienced than I.

One is impressed with the variety of personalities who undertake practice. Some are experimental, critical, and pragmatic; others more devotional, dedicated, and idealistic. Some seem well adjusted and at peace with themselves and the world, while others seem desperate to find happiness and purpose in life. Some adhere literally to every detail of the scriptures, while some instead are dedicated to the interpretations and methods of their respective teachers. Still others attempt to find the ways and means alone by their own individual and unaided efforts. Likewise the techniques and methods which these people have undertaken are also highly varied and divergent.

During this period of personal practice and consultation with others, I have seen what I believe to be some genuine achievements and also some notable failures. The question then is: What is it that succeeds and what is it that does not? And why? Or to state the matter more precisely: One may succeed in one area of meditative development but not in another.

In order to evaluate progress at meditation one must have some criteria or standards against which to judge. Thus we must ask ourselves, what is it that, short of Nibbana, we expect to find in one who has made genuine progress along the Eightfold Path? Momentary periods of euphoria, altered perceptions, or other transient episodes of unusual states of consciousness are not what we seek. Likewise, we are not in pursuit of occult powers, unusual EEG patterns, or control of the autonomic nervous system (such as slowing the heart rate or changing body temperature).

With reference to the Four Noble Truths, we note the Buddha's words: "One thing do I teach: suffering (i.e. //dukkha//) and the end of suffering." Thus if one has truly progressed, we would expect that where previously sad and depressed, one is now less so; where previously selfish, one is now more giving; where previously defensive, secretive, and guarded, one is now more open and self-assured. Worry and anxiety should be reduced. Objective humility should replace conceit. Instead of recurrent thoughts of anger and "getting even" one is more forgiving and at peace with the world. It is felt that such attainments have been observed, occurring as the result of properly directed Buddhist practice.

Again with reference to the Four Noble Truths, it is craving or desire which causes our unhappiness and produces our mental defilements. Thus only by attacking the problems of craving, wanting, and desiring can progress be made. I speak now not so much of the crude and obvious desires such as hunger and sex but of the more subtle ones of egotism, emotional dependency, and desires for possession. One may fast for two weeks and yet never once look at the fact that the real reason for fasting is to feed one's ego -- to be better, more disciplined, more pious than one's fellow practitioners. Or one may work diligently attempting to win the approval, confidence, and affection of a stern and aloof teacher and never once realize that one is attempting to compensate for the frustration and lack of love from a stern and aloof parent. To really break through these "hang ups" one must focus attention, not on the sensation of breath at the nostrils, but instead focus on the agonizing feelings of inadequacy, mediocrity, loneliness, or rejection in one's heart.

When asked "What have you gained from meditation?" the correct answer should be "nothing." For meditation is not for acquiring but for giving up -- a full and complete giving up of the self. Too often people put in a half-hour each day at meditation in the same way that they put in a half-hour studying French. After so many months or years one has a new attribute, a new skill to add to one's already impressive repertoire of virtues, achievements, talents, and abilities. "I can speak French, play the piano, ski, type sixty words a minute, and meditate as well." Such a person is either compensating for strong feelings of inadequacy or else is badly afflicted with narcissism.

Another way in which meditation becomes misdirected, as a result of the very motives which determined it, is the quest for new sensations or experiences, i.e. //lobha//. Many seek from meditation the very same thing they seek from drugs -- i.e. an overwhelming ego-immersing experience of sensations, perceptions, colours, emotions, and "transcendental states beyond words."

It is not meant to belittle such experiences and say that they have no significance or no value. But as with taking LSD or seeing a good motion picture, they quickly pass into memories. And once past, in a very short time one's old mood changes, petty jealousies, conceits, and irritations are back just as strong and as frequent as ever. If there has been no true and lasting personality change, then Buddhist meditation has fallen short of its intended goal.

At the opposite extreme are persons whose approaches to Buddhism are excessively dogmatic, literal, orthodox, and moralistic. They strongly resist a pragmatic, eclectic approach to meditation and are hyper-concerned with the nuances and fine points of Buddhist tradition and decorum. From these sources one repeatedly hears such statements as, "To progress at meditation there must be strict moral discipline," or "You cannot expect fast results but must work for years." Now there is truth in both these statements. But in this context they are really symptoms of extreme rigidity and dogmatism, which in principle is no different than the dogmatism of many Christian missionaries or other persons doggedly committed to a given institution. One's commitment to the tradition and to the letter of the teaching is so strong that one is incapable of truly practising that very same teaching which advises one to have no prejudices and to see truth as universal and independent of any institution. I feel that this unfortunate phenomenon accounts for several instances of very diligent and dedicated meditation practitioners who, despite years of intensive practice, reveal little more than chronic, mild depression mixed with plodding determination.

The theme of guilt and self-punishment is one factor (though not the only one) which tends to perpetuate the phenomenon of diligent striving with minimal results. It usually begins with one taking a highly idealistic, moralistic, and sometimes devotional approach to Dhamma. One tries for one-pointed concentration and complete suppression of mental defilements. One fails and tries again; fails and tries again. Blaming oneself for one's failure one comes to feel guilty and tries even harder, again failing. With this the austerity of one's practice comes to take on a self-punitive nature. Angry with oneself, one becomes more severe with oneself.

For those who have some insight into their dilemma, there may be the added problem of feeling guilty about feeling guilty or becoming irritated that one gets irritated. But insight is also the first step to resolution. The second step is to back off and relax a bit. As the Buddha said, the guitar string once too slack has now been wound too tight, and to produce harmony the tension must be relieved. For idealistic, moralistic personalities, letting go and relaxing are the very things that intensify one's guilt. Yet in principle this is much like what the Buddha did when he renounced austere asceticism and took up the middle way. The practitioner must stand back and re-appraise his whole involvement in Buddhism and examine the matter fully without fearing the consequences of his decision.

In evaluating progress at meditation it is important to distinguish between true Buddhist attainment and adaptation. Any human being (or for that matter almost any biological organism) when placed in a new situation goes through the process of adjusting, adapting, and growing accustomed. This is true of human life in general, and it is true of a man who takes the robes of a Buddhist monk. With the passage of time he grows to accept his role, to acclimatize, and to learn to "work the system"; he may become contented and happy by virtue of duration and age alone.

This process of adaptation is especially relevant in the case of intensive meditation practice where one may spend weeks or months confined to a small room, leaving that room only for brief meetings and instructions from the meditation master. In such situations the practitioner may get extreme feelings of peace and happiness, of clarity and alertness of mind such as never before seen, and also he may glimpse what appear to be transcendental states. (However, moments of depression, agitation, sobbing, etc., are also common, depending on the person.) Many who have completed such training have come away greatly impressed and highly praising this technique. However, it appears that all of these impressive subjective experiences vanish as soon as one comes out of cloistered isolation, and then, much like a drug experience, they remain only as memories. Moreover, many people who have "finished the course" appear to manifest the same selfishness and general human shortcomings as found in human beings picked at random. In addition, there is a hazard in that some "graduates" have revealed extreme pride relative to their attainment.

From this it should not be assumed that there is nothing to be gained from such intensive training. On the contrary, I have frequently suggested it to persons seeking competent meditation instruction. However, I do feel that the empirical evidence shows that for many if not most people this technique alone is insufficient. And the very facts of the Eightfold Path and the Buddhist scriptures in general support this thesis. Thus it would be wise to resolve one's mundane problems of social adjustment and other emotional conflicts before attempting more specialized practices.

Quite often a cloister which protects one from all forms of insults, humiliation, irritation, and anxiety may induce a false sense of attainment and lull one into complacency. We can confront and abolish our mental defilements only when they are actively alive in our minds. We cannot do this when they are but hazy memories or intellectually created notions. Consequently many practitioners have found that their progress is enhanced by having true life situations of social interaction and frustration. On the other hand, an excessive exposure to such interactions and frustrations may exceed one's ability for alert mindfulness, and one thereby insidiously becomes involved with the quarrels and fascinations that breed hatred and sorrow. When living in a cloister where no problems arise, one's defensive reactions and dispositions may lie dormant and thus remain hidden. But in ordinary lay life, temptations, sensations, and problems arise so fast that much of the daily routine is little more than a repeating pattern of perceive, react and solve; perceive, react and solve; perceive, react and solve; and so on.

Thus for many practitioners the solution lies in a middle way between these extremes: that is, a situation in which one still has a moderate exposure to chores, annoyances, and social interactions, but this is interspersed with intervals of quietude and meditation. Such intervals may be a duration of hours or a duration of weeks depending on individual needs and circumstances. Thus by maintaining an optimal amount of involvement with social and sensory arousal, such a one does more than just perceive, react and solve. With mindfulness he is able to catch the perception and reaction as it arises. He observes it, scrutinizes it, and evaluates it. In so doing, it may then be modified, abandoned or developed as seen fit. He acts with mindfulness instead of on habit or reflex, and thus new responses and solutions may be learned. If (as some psychologists have claimed) one's personality is the sum total of one's perceptions, responses and reactions, then in this way the growth and development of the personality is possible.

The optimum proportion of time that one should spend in isolated meditation as contrasted with the time spent in more mundane pursuits will vary among different individuals. It will also vary according to the method of practice and with different times and stages of development for a given individual.

I state these above conclusions not only from a theoretical position and not just because they seem to be revealed in the life pattern of the Buddha and his disciples as portrayed in the suttas. My own limited observations of persons who appear to have progressed at Buddhist practice also fits this conclusion.

It is against such a background of observations and considerations that I have reviewed my own earlier writing on meditation. In essence these words still appear to be sound, and there are no statements that I would see fit to repudiate. However, I feel one point needs to be more strongly emphasized, and that is that a regular daily practice of meditation alone will not be likely to show results unless one is willing to thoroughly scrutinize his or her entire pattern of living and be prepared to revise or abandon this lifestyle if so indicated. In the same way one who undertakes Buddhist training as either a monk or layman would do well not to set a time limit and should not commit himself too strongly to future plans (such as "I will finish my university training" or "I will return to my homeland to teach the Dhamma"). For such a one has already decided beforehand just what he will become and thereby has limited the amount of change that he will allow himself to make.

Also (and partly as a result of Buddhaghosa's writings, i.e. the //Visuddhimagga//) I think I have emphasized too strongly the amount of breathing and other bodily-directed concentrations called for in beginning practice (pp. 16ff.). I say this with some hesitation because it has become popular in some circles to completely disown concentration as important to Buddhist practice, and I do not agree with this view. But if one focuses exclusively on breathing, walking, or whatever to the point of blocking all thoughts and emotions, one is thereby turning his attention away from the very mental defilements and neurotic conflicts that must be confronted in order to be overcome. Thus it is probably significant that in the Noble Eightfold Path right concentration follows after right mindfulness.

One meets a fair number of people who have (or at least claim to have) made considerable attainment at one-pointed concentration. Yet, with a few notable exceptions, they appear to be just as prone to selfishness and petty jealousies as any ordinary persons whom one might meet at random. Some in fact have shown themselves to be very unhappy, lonely, and/or insecure. On the other hand, persons who have made only slight progress at sustained concentration have, nevertheless, in the course of Buddhist practice, made considerable progress at diminishing conceit, resentment, depression, and selfishness. (However, the one person in my experience who, after months of close observation, appears to have made the greatest progress towards removing mental defilements of all sorts, is also the only person I know who appears capable of entering the third jhana at will.)

The same is true of the labelling technique (pp. 20-21) which is especially common in some forms of Burmese intensive training. With this technique one, who in meditation, finds himself daydreaming will simply note this and label it "imagining, imagining" or "fantasy, fantasy" and then return to awareness of breathing, body sensation, or whatever. However, daydreams and fantasies are most often an expression of our desires and emotional conflicts. If one examines the daydream in the frame of mind: "What does it express?" "What desire is it attempting to satisfy?" "What feeling does it carry?" then one can gain insight into his emotional needs and at the same time confront those same mental taints which meditation is supposed to overcome. The labelling technique is, of course, highly useful in dispensing with physical distractions such as itches, pains, and noises; and with certain types of moods (e.g. boredom) and certain kinds of memories. But it must be used judiciously; for if used exclusively it can retard progress.

A general rule of practice which many practitioners have used to advantage is as follows: One starts practice by attempting to quiet and concentrate the mind. But after some minutes of finding that the mind repeatedly wanders from its intended object, the practitioner then stands back as it were and asks: "Just what is my present state of mind at this instant?" "What is it that makes my attention wander from its intended object?" This then is analyzed and confronted. In principle this is much like another useful technique which is: One does not choose any given meditation subject but instead simply sits and takes note: "What is my mental state now? What gross feelings? What subtle feelings? What memories and expectations? What intentions or desires?" In actual practice this is done not in the form of verbal thoughts, as expressed in the preceding sentences, but rather as a state of watchful observation with few if any word thoughts present. Quite often at such times one finds a subtle mental defilement which must be examined and discarded. That is the idea: "Now I am meditating and want to have something to show for it. I want something to happen." Or it may be: "I want to confront and overcome my anger, but now that I'm looking for it, it seems to have gone," and with this arises a feeling of frustration. Herein one has set a goal and been thwarted. Thus the desiring of this specific goal and its resultant frustration is the very state of mind that must be dealt with. Successful meditation requires catching the immediate present.

Finally a note about the attainments in meditation: unless one is very advanced, one does not expect or aspire to any new or unusual experience such as are known in ordinary life. Instead the attainments are negative ones and thus only seen in retrospect. For example, one suddenly reflects: "A year ago I was chronically depressed, unhappy, irritable, defensive. That rarely happens now. Such and such a thing used to upset me greatly. Now it happens and I hardly notice."

It may be stating the case too strongly to say that in meditation one seeks to gain nothing. For there is an increase in happiness and peace of mind. But when asked, "What have you gained from meditation?" the answer would be: "It is not what I have gained that is important but rather what I have diminished, namely, greed, hatred, and delusion."

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Dhammapada, vv. 212-217

At one time, a wealthy brahman went to see the Buddha in order to ask a question.[1] "Friend Gotama," he said, "according to the sayings of brahmans who lived long ago -- men who were old, who taught other teachers -- this world was once very crowded with people. Why does there seem to have been a decrease in the number of people?"

The Buddha answered, "At the present time, brahman, people are infatuated with unrighteous passion (adhamma-raga-ratta), overpowered by inordinate greed (visama-lobhabhi-bhuta), overcome by unnatural (desires) (micchadhamma-pareta). Because of this, they seize knives and weapons and kill each other. Because of this, the (rain) deva does not send timely rains. Because of this, food is scarce, crops fail, there is famine, and people must live on blades of grass. Because of this, Yakkhas release non-human beings (to attack people). This is why there has been such a decrease in the number of people in the world."

After hearing the Buddha's discourse, the brahman took refuge in him.

In this discourse, the Buddha speaks of the three destroyers of the world: war, drought and famine, and pestilence. These three destroyers are also mentioned in a discourse in which the Buddha describes how there is a gradual decline in the human lifespan until people only live for ten years.[2] The same causes are given in both discourses: people are infatuated with unrighteous passion, overpowered by inordinate greed, and overcome by unnatural desires. In the commentaries, unrighteous passion is defined as incest and unnatural desires are defined as homosexuality.

The Buddha says that these tendencies, which give rise to the traditional destroyers, were already prevalent in his own day. Today, they seem to be even more widespread. In the Western world, there has been a general rejection of traditional moral values -- but unfortunately, this has not been accompanied by a healthy re-examination of religious and social teachings. People seem rather to be interested only in finding excuses for satisfying their every desire. They do not believe that wrong actions in this life will lead to suffering in future lives. Once the belief in cause and effect is rejected, then people begin to believe that

Not everyone is so blind, of course. We read of efforts to combat child abuse (including incest), of people who question whether blind accumulation of material possessions can lead to happiness, of reactions to the so-called sexual liberation. But many times people who crusade to re-establish moral rules in our society are considered to be old-fashioned. And it is true that some of the crusaders are religious zealots who go to extremes that work against their cause. Some of the effort is being made by government agencies, and the resulting bureaucracy does not make for efficient handling of the many problems involved.

What is needed in the world today is for people to understand that if they will make the effort to lead moral lives, not only will they be rewarded in future lives -- an idea that may only appeal to people who hold religious beliefs -- but their present life will be happier, too. We should make the effort to follow the basic five precepts, which the Buddha pointed out were necessary if the world is to escape from being destroyed -- not because he invented these precepts, but because they are part of the natural order of the conditioned world. Anyone who has made an honest effort to do so will know what a difference it can make. Leading a moral life gives much joy and energy. We can free ourselves from the fears and anxieties that accompany immoral actions.

It will not be easy. The world has seen constant wars being waged during the twentieth century. The two World Wars were only the largest of many other wars -- some of which are still going on today. We are seeing strange famines in which countries that have bumper crops cannot gather in the food necessary to feed the people, famines in countries with vast stores of food that are not distributed because of the greed of a few people. There is much talk of disruptions in the earth's climate -- the greenhouse effect. Some people see evidence that it is already happening. Others claim there is not enough evidence yet. And many governments refuse to take precautionary steps to try and curb the damage that has already been done -- damage that will affect many future generations. We can see new diseases appearing--the equivalent in the modern world to the un-human beings set loose by yakkhas in the Buddha's discourse. The more modern science tries to find cures, the more difficulties there are to overcome, and the treatments are often so expensive that only a small number of people in the richer countries can benefit. If only a small fraction of the money and effort spent in trying to treat the results were devoted to getting at the root cause, how different the world could be!

We may not be able to feed all the hungry people in the world. We may not be able to find cures for all the diseases in the world. But we can strive to make the world a better place to live in, both for ourselves and for others. The Buddha taught his disciples that through practising the Brahma-viharas (the Divine Abidings) they could protect themselves and help other beings. We should therefore develop //metta// (loving-kindness), //karuna// (compassion), //mudita// (sympathetic joy), and //upekkha// (equanimity).[3] As Ashin Buddhaghosa says, for each of these four Boundless States (appamanna), we should progressively develop thoughts of loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity for various people depending on the characteristics of each Abiding.

For //metta//, we begin with ourselves. If we feel no love for ourselves, we will not be able to feel altruistic love for others. Then we develop thoughts of loving-kindness for others in the following order: someone we like, admire, and respect; someone who is dear to us; someone we feel neutral towards; our enemies. We must at all times strive to avoid feelings of attachment or anger towards others. Loving-kindness is not sentimental. Ashin Buddhaghosa emphasizes especially that for enemies we must avoid all thoughts of anger or resentment in all the four Abidings.

For //karuna//, we begin with thoughts of compassion for an unfortunate person. Then we develop these thoughts for other people in the following order: those who are dear to us, a person we feel neutral towards, a hostile person. For //mudita//, thoughts of sympathetic joy (i.e., rejoicing in the success of others) are developed first for a dear companion, then for a neutral person, and finally for an enemy. //Upekkha// is the most difficult of the four Abidings, for an unperturbed, calm attitude towards others is very hard to maintain. We should begin with thoughts of equanimity for a person we are neutral towards, then move on to a dear person, and then to a hostile person.

Once we have mastered the four Abidings with regards to individuals we know, then we can develop thoughts of loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity towards all beings everywhere. We can think in terms of all beings in all directions: those in front of us, those behind us, those to our left, those to our right, those above, and those below. Developing thoughts such as these will make us better people and will work for the good of one and all. These Divine Abidings will also help us to put into practice other aspects of the Buddha's Teachings.

For those of us who are fortunate enough to follow the Buddha's Teachings, we will do more than just try to restrain the innate tendencies that push us to act in ways that will bring on the destruction of the world. We will work to eradicate these innate tendencies by developing our concentration and our insight. As Sayagyi U Ba Khin pointed out:[4]

In Buddhism we have the cure for all the mental ills that affect mankind. It is the evil forces of the mind (past and present) that are responsible for the present state of affairs all over the world. By inspiring a strong sense of Buddhism into the minds of the people during the most critical days of Burma some two years ago [written in 1951], we have been able to get over the crisis.

Nowadays, there is dissatisfaction almost everywhere. Dissatisfaction creates ill-feeling. Ill-feeling creates hatred. Hatred creates enmity. Enmity creates war. War creates enemies. Enemies create war. War creates enemies and so on. It is now becoming a vicious circle. Why? Certainly because there is lack of proper control over the mind. ... Let us then study the mind and its peculiar characteristics and solve the problem that is now facing the world.

DEVOTION IN BUDDHISM

The Buddha repeatedly discouraged any excessive veneration paid to him personally. He knew that an excess of purely emotional devotion can obstruct or disturb the development of a balanced character, and thus may become a serious obstacle to progress on the path to deliverance. The history of religion has since proved him right, as illustrated by the extravagancies of emotional mysticism in East and West.

The suttas relate the story of the monk Vakkali, who full of devotion and love for the Buddha, was ever desirous to behold him bodily. To him the Buddha said: "What shall it profit you to see this impure body? He who sees the Dhamma, sees me."

Shortly before the Buddha passed away, he said: "If a monk or a nun, a devout man or a devout woman, lives in accordance with the Dhamma, is correct in his life, walks in conformity with the Dhamma - it is he who rightly honours, reverences, venerates, holds sacred and reveres the Perfect One (//tathagata//) with the worthiest homage."

A true and deep understanding of the Dhamma, together with a conduct that is in conformity with that understanding - these are vastly superior to any external homage or mere emotional devotion. That is the instruction conveyed by these two teachings of the Master.

It would be a mistake, however, to conclude that the Buddha disparaged a reverential and devotional attitude of mind when it is the natural outflow of a true understanding and a deep admiration of what is great and noble. It would also be a grievous error to believe that the "seeing of the Dhamma" (spoken of in the first saying) is identical with a mere intellectual appreciation and purely conceptual grasp of the doctrine. Such a one-sided abstract approach to the very concrete message of the Buddha all too often leads to intellectual smugness. In its barrenness it will certainly not be a substitute for the strong and enlivening impulse imparted by a deep-felt devotion to what is known as great, noble and exemplary. Devotion, being a facet and natural accompaniment of confidence (//saddha//), is a necessary factor in the "balance of faculties" (//indriya-samata//) required for final deliverance. Confidence, in all its aspects, including the devotional, is needed to resolve any stagnation and other shortcomings resulting from a one-sided development of the intellectual faculties. Such development often tends to turn around in circles endlessly, without being able to effect a break-through. Here, devotion, confidence and faith - all aspects of the Pali term //saddha// - may be able to give quick and effective help.

Though the Buddha refused to be made the object of an emotional "personality cult", he also knew that "respect and homage paid to those who are worthy of it, is a great blessing." The Buddha made this statement in the very first stanza of one of his principal ethical injunctions, the Discourse on Blessings (//Maha-Mangala Sutta(*1)//). Mentioning the value of a respectful, reverential attitude together with the blessings "avoiding fools and associating with the wise," the Buddha obviously regarded such an attitude as fundamental for individual and social progress and for the acquisition of any further higher benefits. One who is incapable of a reverential attitude will also be incapable of spiritual progress beyond the narrow limits of his present mental condition. One who is so blind as not to see or recognize anything higher and better than the little mud-pool of his petty self and environment will suffer for a long time from retarded growth. And one who, out of a demonstrative self-assertion, scorns a reverential attitude in himself and in others will remain imprisoned in his self-conceit - a most formidable bar to a true maturity of character and to spiritual growth. It is by recognizing and honouring someone or something higher that one honours and enhances one's own inner potentialities.

> "When the high heart we magnify,
> And the sure vision celebrate,
> And worship greatness passing by,
> Ourselves are great."

Since respect, reverence and devotion are partial aspects of the Buddhist concept of confidence, one will now understand why confidence has been called the seed of all other beneficial qualities.

The nobler the object of reverence or devotion, the higher is the blessing bestowed by it. "Those who have joyous confidence in the highest, the highest fruit will be theirs" (Anguttara-Nikaya, The Fours, No.34). The supreme objects of a Buddhist's reverence and devotion are his Three Refuges, also called the Three Jewels or Ideals: the Buddha, his Teaching (Dhamma) and the Community of saintly monks and nuns (Sangha) (*2). Here, too, the Buddha is revered not as a personality of such a name, nor as a deity, but as the embodiment of Enlightenment.

A text often recurring in the Buddhist scriptures, says that a devout lay disciple "has confidence, he believes in the Enlightenment of the Perfect One." This confidence, however, is not the outcome of blind faith based on hearsay, but is derived from the devotee's reasoned conviction based on his own understanding of the Buddha Word which speaks to him clearly with a voice of unmistakable Enlightenment. This derivation of his assurance is emphasized by the fact that, along with confidence, wisdom also is mentioned among the qualities of an ideal lay follower.

We may now ask: Is it not quite natural that feelings of love, gratitude, reverence and devotion seek expression through the entire personality, through acts of body and speech as well as through our thoughts and unexpressed sentiments? Will one, for instance, hide one's feelings towards parents and other loved ones? Will one not rather express them by loving words and deeds? Will one not cherish their memory in suitable ways, as for instance, by preserving their pictures in one's home, by placing flowers on their graves, by recalling their noble qualities? In such a way, one who has become critical of the devotional aspects of religion may seek to understand the outward acts of homage customary in Buddhist lands when, with reverential gesture, flowers and incense are placed before a Buddha image and devotional texts are recited not as prayers but as meditation. Provided that such practice does not deteriorate into a thoughtless routine, a follower of the Dhamma will derive benefit if he takes up some form of a devotional practice, adapting it to his personal temperament and to the social customs of his environment. Buddhism however, does not in the least impose upon its followers a //demand// to observe any outward form of devotion or worship. This is entirely left to the choice of individuals whose emotional, devotional and intellectual needs are bound to differ greatly. No Buddhist should feel himself forced into an iron-cast mould, be it of a devotional or a rationalistic shape. As a follower of the middle way, he should, however, also avoid one-sided judgement of others, and try to appreciate that their individual needs and preferences may differ from his own.

More important and of greater general validity than outward forms of devotion is the basic capacity for respect and reverence discussed at the beginning of this essay, and also the practice of meditations or contemplations of a devotional character. Many benefits accrue from these and hence it was for good reasons that the Enlightened One strongly and repeatedly recommended the meditative recollection of the Buddha (//buddhanussati//), along with other kindred devotional recollections(*3). Here again, the reference is to the embodied ideal; thus the Buddha, as a being freed from all traces of vanity and egotism, could venture to recommend to his disciples a meditation on the Buddha.

What, then, are the benefits of such devotional meditations? Their first benefit is //mental purification//. They have been called by the Buddha "efficacious procedures for purifying a defiled mind" (Angutt. Nik., The Threes, No.71). "When a noble disciple contemplates upon the Enlightened One, at that time his mind is not enwrapped in lust, nor in hatred, nor in delusion. At such a time his mind is rightly directed: it has got rid of lust, is aloof from it, is freed from it. Lust is here a name for the five sense desires. By cultivating this contemplation, many beings become purified" (Angutt. Nik., The Sixes, No.25).

If, by practising that devotional meditation, one endeavours to live, as it were, "in the Master's presence" (//sattha sammukhibhuta//), one will feel ashamed to do, speak or think anything unworthy; one will shrink back from evil; and as a positive reaction, one will feel inspired to high endeavour in emulation of the Master's great example.

Images, and not abstract concepts, are the language of the subconscious. If, therefore, the image of the Enlightened One is often created within one's mind as the embodiment of man perfected, it will penetrate deeply into the subconscious, and if sufficiently strong, will act as an automatic brake against evil impulses. In such a way the subconscious, normally so often the hidden enemy in gaining self-mastery, may become a powerful ally of such an endeavour. For that purpose of //educating the subconscious//, it will be helpful to use a Buddha image or picture as an aid in visualization. In that way concentration of mind may be attained fairly soon. For evoking and deeply absorbing some features of the Buddha's personality, his qualities should be contemplated, for instance in the way described in the //Visuddhimagga//.

The recollection of the Buddha, being productive of joy (//piti//), is an effective way of //invigorating the mind//, of lifting it up from the states of listlessness, tension, fatigue, and frustration, which occur during meditation as well as in ordinary life. The Buddha himself advised: "If (in the strenuous practice of meditation, for instance) in contemplation of the body, bodily agitation, including sense desires, or mental lassitude or distraction should arise, then the meditator should turn his mind to a gladdening, elevating subject" (Samy. 47, 10). And here the teachers of old recommend especially the recollection of the Buddha. When those hindrances to concentration vanish under its influence, the meditator will be able to return to his original meditation subject.

For a beginner especially, attempts at gaining concentration are often frustrated by an uneasy self-consciousness; the meditator, as it were, squints back upon himself. He becomes disturbingly aware of his body with its little discomforts, and of his mind struggling against obstacles which only grow stronger the more he struggles. This may happen when the subject of meditation is one's one physical or mental processes, but it may also occur with other subjects. In such a situation, it will be profitable to follow the advice given earlier and to turn one's attention from one's own personality to the inspiring visualization of the Buddha and the contemplation of his qualities. The joyful interest thus produced may bring about that self-forgetfulness which is such an important factor for gaining concentration. Joy produces calm (//passadhi//), calm leads to ease (//sukha//), and ease to concentration (//samadhi//). Thus devotional meditation can serve as a valuable //aid in attaining mental concentration// which is the basis of liberating insight. This function of devotional meditation cannot be better described than in the words of the Master:

> "When a noble disciple contemplates upon the Enlightened One, at that time his mind is not enwrapped in lust, nor in hatred, nor in delusion. At such a time his mind is rightly directed towards the Perfect One (Tathagata). And with a rightly directed mind the noble disciple gains enthusiasm for the goal, enthusiasm for the Dhamma, gains the delight derived from the Dhamma. In him thus delighted, joy arises; to one who is joyful, body and mind become calm; calmed in body and mind, he feels at ease; and if at ease, the mind finds concentration. Such a one is called a noble disciple who among humanity gone wrong, has attained to what is right; who among a humanity beset by troubles, dwells free of troubles."

COURAGEOUS FAITH

Faith involves not merely a belief in the existence of a thing or in the truth of a creedal formula, but also confidence in the power of its object. Religious faith is the belief and confidence in the power of the Supreme Good, and Buddhist faith, in particular, the belief in the incomparable power of the Noble Eightfold Path, the confidence in its purifying and liberating efficacy.

Among those calling themselves "believers" or "religious people" or, in our case, Buddhists, there are still too few who have that kind of genuine faith in the actual power of the Good to transform and elevate the life of the individual and of society, to secure them against the resistance of the evil in themselves and in the world outside. Too few dare to entrust themselves to the powerful current of the Good, too many secretly believe, in spite of a vague sort of "faith," that the power of the evil in themselves and the world is stronger - too strong to be contended with. Many politicians everywhere in the world seem to believe the same, particularly those who call themselves "realists," obviously implying that only the evil is "real." They think that of necessity they have to submit to its greater power. If they are not willing to put it to the test, it is no wonder that they cannot achieve much good.

To be sure, in face of the great forces of evil and stupidity, this kind of genuine faith in the Good requires a certain amount of courage. But no progress of any kind is possible without courage. Progress means to overcome the natural inertia of present unsatisfactory conditions in the individual and in society. It certainly requires courage to take the first step in breaking through that resistance of the natural inertia and the self-preserving tendency of things and minds. But just that courage is the preliminary condition of success.

The ancient teachers of the Buddhist doctrine were well aware that courage is an essential feature of true faith. They therefore compared faith to a strong and courageous hero who plunges ahead into the turbulent waters of a stream to lead safely across the weaker people who timidly stop at the shore, or, excitedly and in vain, run up and down the bank engaged in useless arguments about the proper place to cross. This simile can be applied to the social as well as to the inner life. In the case of social life, the "weaker people" are those who are willing to follow and support a leader but who cannot make a start by themselves. In the case of the inner life, the "weaker people" are those qualities necessary for spiritual progress which are either undeveloped or isolated from their supplementary virtues.

Two factors of inner progress which supplement, support and balance each other are intellect (//panna//) and faith (//saddha//). If intellect remains without the confidence, devotion and zeal of faith, it will stop short at a mere theoretical understanding and intellectual appreciation of teachings meant to be lived and not only thought or talked about. In the words of our simile: intellect, if not helped by the hero of faith, will merely "run up and down the bank of the stream," an activity with a very busy and important appearance but with few actual results. Intellect separated from faith will lack the firm belief in its own power to be the guide on the path of life. Without this inner conviction it will hesitate to follow in earnest its own conclusions and commands; it will lack the courage to make an actual start on the task of "crossing over."

Faith as a supplementary quality, supported by the vigour and endurance of energy (//viriya//), will give wings to the intellect, enabling it to rise above the barrenness of unapplied knowledge and the futile wordy wars of conceptual thought. In exchange, intellect will give to faith discriminative judgement and reliable guidance. It will prevent faith from becoming exhausted, from wasting its energies by ineffective emotional effusions and misdirected efforts. Therefore, faith and intellect should always be harmonized. With right mindfulness keeping them balanced, the two together will prove to be ideal companions, able to meet by their combined efforts any dangers and difficulties on the road to liberation.

The Dhammapada - Information

The Dhammapada is an anthology of verses, belonging to the part of the Theravada Pali Canon of scriptures known as the Khuddaka Nikaya, and consists of 423 verses.

Something like a quarter of the verses are to be found in other parts of the Pali Tipitaka, particularly in the other verse parts of the Khuddaka Nikaya such as the Sutta Nipata and the Thera- and Theri-gatha.

The Dhammapada is probably the most popular book of the Pali Canon, with the possible exception of the Satipatthana Sutta, or the Sutta on the Turning of the Wheel of the Law (Dhamma-cakka-ppavattana Sutta). It is certainly the most frequently translated portion.

There are a number of Mahayana works to which it appears to be closely related. There are in the Chinese scriptures 4 works resembling the Dhammapada. The nearest is the Fa Chu Ching, which was translated in AD 223. (translated by Beal), the first part of which seems to be a direct translation of the Pali Dhammapada. (It is intriguing to wonder how a Pali work found its way to China in those early years. The Introduction merely says it was brought from India and was translated as a joint venture by a Chinese and an Indian.) One small piece of evidence that the Chinese is a translation from the Pali is found in the verse corrsponding to the Pali verse 146. The Chinese here reads "remembering the everlasting burnings", having mistaken the word "sati", (which in the Pali is the locative case of the present participle of a verb for "being") for the noun "sati", memory, or recollection. The later part of the Chinese appears to be an anthology in its own right.

There is also a Dhammapada in the Gandhari language (edited and translated by Brough), but although it contains at least half of its verses in common with the Pali Dhammapada, the order and distribution make it fairly certain that there is no direct link between the two works.

There is another work in Sanskrit called the Udanavarga, which also has a large number of verses in common with the Dhammapada, but again seems to be a completely independent compilation. It is often most instructive though to compare some of the verses in these different collections. Sometimes they are effectively identical, but at other times they are radically different. It would be a rash man, in our present state of scholarship, who ventured to assert which is the original.

Like most anthologies of verses, the Dhammapada is very uneven. Some verses are both profound and deeply poetic. Others are awkward, and little more than a list of technical terms. The overall effect of the Dhammapada however is undoubtedly of high moral and spiritual earnestness, and a typically Buddhist gentle persuasiveness. It would be hard to point to a poetic book of a similar length in world religious literature of a correspondingly sustained level.

The Dhammapada
(An Anthology of Verses)

1. The Pairs

Mind precedes its objects. They are mind-governed and mind-made. To speak or act with a defiled mind is to draw pain after oneself, like a wheel behind the feet of the animal drawing it. 1

Mind precedes its objects. They are mind-governed and mind-made. To speak or act with a peaceful mind, is to draw happiness after oneself, like an inseparable shadow. 2

I have been insulted! I have been hurt! I have been beaten! I have been robbed! Anger does not cease in those who harbour this sort of thought. 3

I have been insulted! I have been hurt! I have been beaten! I have been robbed! Anger ceases in those who do not harbour this sort of thought. 4

Occasions of hatred are certainly never settled by hatred. They are settled by freedom from hatred. This is the eternal law. 5

Others may not understand that we must practice self-control, but quarrelling dies away in those who understand this fact. 6

The Tempter masters the lazy and irresolute man who dwells on the attractive side of things, ungoverned in his senses, and unrestrained in his food, like the wind overcomes a rotten tree. 7

But the Tempter cannot master a man who dwells on the distasteful side of things, self- controlled in his senses, moderate in eating, resolute and full of faith, like the wind cannot move a mountain crag. 8

The man who wears the yellow-dyed robe but is not free from stains himself, without self- restraint and integrity, is unworthy of the robe. 9

But the man who has freed himself of stains and has found peace of mind in an upright life, possessing self-restraint and integrity, he is indeed worthy of the dyed robe. 10

To see the essence in the unessential and to see the essence as unessential means one can never get to the essence, wandering as one is in the road of wrong intentions. 11

But to see the essence in the essential and the unessential as the unessential it is means one does get to the essence, being on the road of right intentions. 12

In the same way that rain breaks into a house with a bad roof, desire breaks into the mind that has not been practising meditation. 13

While in the same way that rain cannot break into a well-roofed house, desire cannot break into a mind that has been practising meditation well. 14

Here and beyond he suffers. The wrong-doer suffers both ways. He suffers and is tormented to see his own depraved behaviour. 15

Here and beyond he is glad. The doer of good is glad both ways. He is glad and rejoices to see his own good deeds. 16

Here and beyond he is punished. The wrong-doer is punished both ways. He is punished by the thought, "I have done evil", and is even more punished when he comes to a bad state. 17

Here and beyond he rejoices. The doer of good rejoices both way. He rejoices at the thought, "I have done good", and rejoices even more when he comes to a happy state. 18

Even if he is fond of quoting appropriate texts, the thoughtless man who does not put them into practice himself is like cowherd counting other people's cows, not a partner in the Holy Life. 19

Even if he does not quote appropriate texts much, if he follows the principles of the Teaching by getting rid of greed, hatred and delusion, deep of insight and with a mind free from attachment, not clinging to anything in this world or the next - that man is a partner in the Holy Life. 20

2. Attention

Attention leads to immortality. Carelessness leads to death. Those who pay attention will not die, while the careless are as good as dead already. 21

So having clearly understood the value of attention, wise men take pleasure in it, rejoicing in what the saints have practised. 22

Those who meditate with perseverance, constantly working hard at it, are the wise who experience Nirvana, the ultimate freedom from chains. 23

When a man is resolute and recollected, pure of deed and persevering, when he is attentive and self-controlled and lives according to the Teaching, his reputation is bound to grow. 24

By resolution and attention, by discipline and self-control, a clever man may build himself an island that no flood can overthrow. 25

Foolish, ignorant people indulge in careless lives, whereas a clever man guards his attention as his most precious possession. 26

Don't indulge in careless behaviour. Don't be the friend of sensual pleasures. He who meditates attentively attains abundant joy. 27

When a wise man has carefully rid himself of carelessness and climbed the High Castle of Wisdom, sorrowless he observes sorrowing people, like a clear-sighted man on a mountain top looking down on the people with limited vision on the ground below. 28

Careful amidst the careless, amongst the sleeping wide-awake, the intelligent man leaves them all behind, like a race-horse does a mere hack. 29

It was by attention that Indra attained the highest place among the gods. People approve of attention, while carelessness is always condemned. 30

A bhikkhu taking pleasure in being attentive, and recognising the danger of carelessness, makes progress like a forest fire, consuming all obstacles large or small in his way. 31

A bhikkhu taking pleasure in being attentive, and recognising the danger of carelessness, is incapable of falling away. In fact he is already close to Nirvana. 32

3. Thoughts

Elusive and unreliable as it is, the wise man straightens out his restless, agitated mind, like a fletcher crafting an arrow. 33

Trying to break out of the Tempter's control, one's mind writhes to and fro, like a fish pulled from its watery home onto dry ground. 34

It is good to restrain one's mind, uncontrollable, fast moving, and following its own desires as it is. A disciplined mind leads to happiness. 35

A wise man should guard his mind for it is very hard to keep track of, extremely subtle, and follows its own desires. A guarded mind brings happiness. 36

The mind goes wandering off far and wide alone. Incorporeal, it dwells in the cavern of the heart. Those who keep it under control escape from Mara's bonds. 37

If he is unsettled in mind, does not know the true Teaching, and has lost his peace of mind, a man's wisdom does not come to fulfilment. 38

With his mind free from the inflow of thoughts and from restlessness, by abandoning both good and evil, an alert man knows no fear. 39

Seeing your body as no better than an earthen pot, make war on Mara with the sword of wisdom, and setting up your mind as a fortress, defend what you have won, remaining free from attachment. 40

Before long this body will be lying on the ground, discarded and unconscious, like a useless bit of wood. 41

One's own misdirected thought can do one more harm than an enemy or an ill-wisher. 42

Even your mother, father or any other relative cannot do you as much good as your own properly directed thought. 43

4. Flowers

Who will master this world and the world of Death with its devas? Who will gather well taught aphorisms (dhammapadas), like an connoisseur picking a flower? 44

A disciple will master this world and the world of Death with its devas. A disciple will gather well taught aphorisms (dhammapadas), like a connoisseur picking a flower. 45

Seeing the foam-like nature of the body, and awakening to its mirage-like quality, one can escape the sight of the King of Death, snapping Mara's flowery bonds. 46

Death carries off a man busy picking flowers with an besotted mind, like a great flood does a sleeping village. 47

Death, the end-maker, will exercise his will on a man busy picking flowers with a besotted mind, before he has even found satisfaction. 48

A holy man should behave in the village like a bee which takes its food from a flower without hurting its appearance or its scent. 49

It is no the shortcomings of others, nor what others have done or not done that one should think about, but what one has done or not done oneself. 50

Like a fine flower, beautiful to look at but without scent, fine words are fruitless in a man who does not act in accordance with them. 51

Like a fine flower, beautiful to look at and scented too, fine words bear fruit in a man who acts well in accordance with them. 52

Just as one can make a lot of garlands from a heap of flowers, so man, subject to birth and death as he is, should make himself a lot of good karma. 53

The scent of flowers cannot travel against the wind, and nor can that of sandalwood or jasmine, but the fragrance of the good does travel against the wind, and a good man perfumes the four quarters of the earth. 54

Sandalwood, tagara, lotus, jasmine - the fragrance of virtue is unrivalled by such kinds of perfume. 55

The perfume of tagara and sandalwood is of little enough power, while the supreme fragrance, that of the virtuous, reaches even up to the devas. 56

Perfect of virtue, always acting with recollection, and liberated by final realisation - Mara does not know the path such people travel. 57

Like a beautiful, fragrant lotus, springing up on a pile of rubbish thrown out on the highway, so a disciple of the Enlightened One stands out among rubbish-like and blinded ordinary people by virtue of his wisdom. 58, 59

5. The Fool

Long is the night for the sleepless. Long is the road for the weary. Long is samsara (the cycle of continued rebirth) for the foolish, who have not recognised the true teaching. 60

If on one's way one does not come across one's better or an equal, then one should press on resolutely alone. There is no companionship with a fool. 61

"I've got children", "I've got wealth." This is the way a fool brings suffering on himself. He does not even own himself, so how can he have children or wealth? 62

A fool who recognises his own ignorance is thereby in fact a wise man, but a fool who considers himself wise - that is what one really calls a fool. 63

Even if a fool lived with a wise man all his life, he would still not recognise the truth, like a wooden spoon cannot recognise the flavour of the soup. 64

Even if a man of intelligence lives with a wise man only for a moment, he will immediately recognise the truth, like one's tongue recognises the flavour of the soup. 65

Stupid fools go through life as their own enemies, doing evil deeds which have bitter consequences. 66

A deed is not well done if one suffers after doing it, if one bears the consequences sobbing and with tears streaming down one's face. 67

But a deed is well done if one does not suffer after doing it, if one experiences the consequences smiling and contented. 68

A fool thinks it like honey so long as the bad deed does not bear fruit, but when it does bear fruit he experiences suffering. 69

Even if a fool were to take his food month after month off the tip of a blade of grass, he would still not be worth a fraction of those who have understood the truth. 70

Like fresh milk a bad deed does not turn at once. It follows a fool scorching him like a smouldering fire. 71

A fool acquires knowledge only to his own disadvantage. It destroys what good he has, and turns his brains. 72

One may desire a spurious respect and precedence among one's fellow monks, and the veneration of outsiders. "Both monks and laity should think it was my doing. They should accept my authority in all matters great or small." This is a fool's way of thinking. His self-seeking and conceit just increase. 73, 74

One way leads to acquisition, the other leads to nirvana. Realising this a monk, as a disciple of the Buddha, should take no pleasure in the respect of others, but should devote himself to solitude. 75

6. The Wise Man

Like one pointing out hidden treasure, if one finds a man of intelligence who can recognise one's faults and take one to task for them, one should cultivate the company of such a wise man. He who cultivates a man like that is the better for it, not worse. 76

If a man disciplines, instructs and restrains them from what is not right, he will be dear to the good, and disliked by the bad. 77

Don't cultivate the company of bad companions. Don't cultivate depraved men. Cultivate companions of good character. Cultivate superior men. 78

He who drinks in the Truth will live happily with a peaceful mind. A wise man always delights in the Truth taught by the saints. 79

Navvies channel water, fletchers fashion arrows, and carpenters work on wood, but the wise disciple themselves. 80

Like a solid rock is not shaken by the wind, so the wise are not moved by praise or blame. 81

The wise find peace on hearing the truth, like a deep, clear, undisturbed lake. 82

The good renounce everything. The pure don't babble about sensual desires. Whether touched by pleasure or pain, the wise show no change of temper. 83

If a man does not seek children, wealth or power either for himself or for someone else, if he does not seek his own advantage by unprincipled means, he is a virtuous man, a wise man and a righteous man. 84

Few are those among men who have crossed over to the other shore, while the rest of mankind runs along the bank. However those who follow the principles of the well-taught Truth will cross over to the other shore, out of the dominion of Death, hard though it is to escape. 85, 86

A wise man, abandoning the principle of darkness, should cultivate what is pure. Leaving home for the homeless life, let him seek his joy in the solitude which people find so hard to enjoy, and, abandoning sensual pleasures, let him cleanse himself of inner defilements, looking on nothing as his own. 87, 88

Those whose minds are thoroughly practices in the factors of enlightenment, who find delight in freedom from attachment in the renunciation of clinging, free from the inflow of thoughts, they are like shining lights, having reached final liberation in the world. 89

7. The Enlightened

Journey over, sorrowless, freed in every way, and with all bonds broken - for such a man there is no more distress. 90

The recollected go forth to lives of renunciation. They take no pleasure in a fixed abode. Like wild swans abandoning a pool, they leave one resting place after another. 91

Those for whom there is no more acquisition, who are fully aware of the nature of food, whose dwelling place is an empty and imageless release - the way of such people is hard to follow, like the path of birds through the sky. 92

He whose inflowing thoughts are dried up, who is unattached to food, whose dwelling place is an empty and imageless release - the way of such a person is hard to follow, like the path of birds through the sky. 93

When a man's senses have come to peace, like a horses well broken by the trainer, when he is rid of conceit and without inflowing thoughts - even devas envy such a well set man. 94

Like the earth he is not disturbed, like a great pillar he is firmly set and reliable, like a lake he is free from defilement. There are no more rebirths for such a well set man. 95

Freed by full realisation and at peace, the mind of such a man is at peace, and his speech and action peaceful. 96

He has no need for faith who knows the uncreated, who has cut off rebirth, who has destroyed any opportunity for good or evil, and cast away all desire. He is indeed the ultimate man. 97

Whether in the village or the forest, whether on high ground or low, wherever the enlightened live, that is a delightful spot. 98

Delightful for them are the forests where men find no delight. The desire-free find delight there, for they seek no sensual joys. 99

8. The Thousands

Better than a thousand pointless words is one saying to the point on hearing which one finds peace. 100

Better than a thousand pointless verses is one stanza on hearing which one finds peace. 101

Better than reciting a hundred pointless verses is one verse of the teaching (one dhammapada) on hearing which one finds peace. 102

Though one were to defeat thousands upon thousands of men in battle, if another were to overcome just one - himself, he is the supreme victor. 103

Victory over oneself is better than that over others. When a man has conquered himself and always acts with self-control, neither devas, spirits, Mara or Brahma can reverse the victory of a man like that. 104, 105

Though one were to perform sacrifices by the thousand month after month for a hundred years, if another were to pay homage to a single inwardly perfected man for just a moment, that homage is better than the hundred years of sacrifices. 106

Though one were to tend the sacrificial fire for a hundred years in the forest, if another were to pay homage to a single inwardly perfected man for just a moment, that homage is better than the hundred years of sacrifice. 107

All the sacrifices and offerings a man desiring merit could make in a year in the world are not worth a quarter of the better merit of homage to the righteous. 108

Four principal things increase in the man who is respectful and always honours his elders - length of life, good looks, happiness and health. 109

Though one were to live a hundred years immoral and with a mind unstilled by meditation, the life of a single day is better if one is moral and practises meditation. 110

Though one were to live a hundred years without wisdom and with a mind unstilled by meditation, the life of a single day is better if one is wise and practises meditation. 111

Though one were to live a hundred years without seeing the rise and passing of things, the life of a single day is better if one sees the rise and passing of things. 113

Though one were to live a hundred years without seeing the deathless state, the life of a single day is better if one sees the deathless state. 114

Though one were to live a hundred years without seeing the supreme truth, the life of a single day is better if one sees the supreme truth. 115

9. Evil

Be urgent in good; hold your thoughts off evil. When one is slack in doing good the mind delights in evil. 116

If a man has done evil, let him not keep on doing it. Let him not create an inclination to it. The accumulation of evil means suffering. 117

If a man has done good, let him keep on doing it. Let him create an inclination to it. The accumulation of good means happiness. 118

An evil man encounters good so long as his evil behaviour does not bear fruit, but when his evil behaviour bears fruit, then the evil man encounters the evil consequences. 119

An good man encounters evil so long as his good behaviour does not bear fruit, but when his good behaviour bears fruit, then the good man encounters the good consequences. 120

Do not think lightly of evil that not the least consequence will come of it. A whole waterpot will fill up from dripping drops of water. A fool fills himself with evil, just a little at a time. 121

Do not think lightly of good that not the least consequence will come of it. A whole waterpot will fill up from dripping drops of water. A wise man fills himself with good, just a little at a time. 122

One should avoid evil like a merchant with much goods and only a small escort avoids a dangerous road, and like a man who loves life avoids poison. 123

If there is no wound on one's hand, one can handle poison. Poison has no effect where there is no wound. There is no evil for the non-doer. 124

Whoever does harm to an innocent man, a pure man and a faultless one, the evil comes back on that fool, like fine dust thrown into the wind. 125

Some are reborn in a human womb, evil-doers go to hell, the good go to heaven, and those without inflowing thoughts achieve final liberation. 126

Not in the sky, nor in the depths of the sea, nor hiding in the cleft of the rocks, there is no place on earth where one can take one's stand to escape from an evil deed. 127

Not in the sky, nor in the depths of the sea, nor hiding in the cleft of the rocks, there is no place on earth where one can take one's stand to not be overcome by death. 128

10. Violence

All fear violence, all are afraid of death. Seeing the similarity to oneself, one should not use violence or have it used. 129

All fear violence, life is dear to all. Seeing the similarity to oneself, one should not use violence or have it used. 130

He who does violence to creatures seeking happiness like himself does not find happiness after death. 131

He who does no violence to creatures seeking happiness like himself does find happiness after death. 132

Don't speak harshly to anyone. If you do people will speak to you in the same way. Harsh words are painful and their retaliation will hurt you. 133

If you don't disturb yourself, like a broken gong does not vibrate, then you have achieved nirvana. Irritability no longer exists for you. 134

Like a cowherd driving cows off to the fields, so old age and death take away the years from the living. 135

Even when he is doing evil, the fool does not realise it. The idiot is punished by his own deeds, like one is scorched by fire. 136

He who does violence to the peaceful and harmless soon encounters one of ten things - He may experience cruel pain, disaster, physical injury, severe illness, or insanity, or else trouble with the authorities, grave accusation, bereavement, or loss of property, or else destruction of his house by fire, and on the death of his body the fool goes to hell. 137, 138, 139, 140

Neither naked asceticism, matted hair, dirt, fasting, sleeping on the ground, dust and mud, nor prolonged sitting on one's heels can purify a man who is not free of doubts. 141

Even if richly dressed, when a man behaves even-mindedly and is at peace, restrained and established in the right way, chaste and renouncing violence to all forms of life, then he is a brahmin, he is a holy man, he is a bhikkhu (true Buddhist monk). 142

Where is that man in the world who is so restrained by shame that he avoids laziness like a thoroughbred horse avoids the whip? 143

Like a thoroughbred horse touched by the whip, be strenuous and determined. Then you will be able to rid yourself of this great suffering by means of faith, morality, energetic behaviour, stillness of mind and reflection on the teaching, after you have become full of wisdom, good habits and recollection. 144

Navvies channel water, fletchers fashion arrows, and carpenters work on wood, but the good disciple themselves. 145

11. Old Age

What is this laughter, what is this delight, forever burning (with desires) as you are? Enveloped in darkness as you are, will you not look for a lamp? 146

Look at the decorated puppet, a mass of wounds and of composite parts, full of disease and always in need of attention. It has no enduring stability. 147

This body is worn out with age, a nest of diseases and falling apart. The mass of corruption disintegrates, and death is the end of life. 148

When these grey bones are cast aside like gourds in autumn, what pleasure will there be in looking at them? 149

It is a city built of bones, and daubed with flesh and blood, in which old age and death, pride and hypocrisy are the inhabitants. 150

Even kings' splendid carriages wear out, and the body is certain bound to grow old, but the Truth found by the saints is not subject to aging. That is what the saints themselves proclaim. 151

An ignorant man ages like an ox. His flesh may increase, but not his understanding. 152

I have passed in ignorance through a cycle of many rebirths, seeking the builder of the house. Continuous rebirth is a painful thing. But now, housebuilder, I have found you out. You will not build me a house again. All your rafters are broken, your ridge-pole shattered. My mind is free from active thought, and has made an end of craving. 153, 154

Those who have not lived the holy life, and have not acquired wealth in their youth, grow old like withered cranes beside a fishless pool. 155

Those who have not lived the holy life, and have not acquired wealth in their youth, lie like spent arrows, grieving for times past. 156

12. Self

Knowing that one is dear to oneself, one should guard oneself well. For one out of the three watches of the night a wise man should keep watch. 157

First he should establish himself in what is right. Then if he teaches others, the wise man will not be corrupted. 158

If one would only apply to oneself what one teaches others, when one was well disciplined oneself one could train others. It is oneself who is hard to train. 159

One is one's own guardian. What other guardian could one have? With oneself well disciplined one obtains a rare guardian indeed. 160

The evil he has done himself and which had its origin and being in himself breaks a fool, like a diamond breaks a precious stone. 161

A man of great immorality is like a creeper, suffocating the tree it is on. He does to himself just what an enemy would wish him. 162

Things which are wrong and to one's own disadvantage are easily enough done, while what is both good and advantageous is extremely hard to do. 163

The fool, who out of attachment to a wrong view speaks ill of the religion of the enlightened and noble ones who live according to truth, brings forth fruit to his own downfall, like the offspring of the bamboo. 164

By oneself one does evil. By oneself one is defiled. By oneself one abstains from evil. By oneself one is purified. Purity and impurity are personal matters. No one can purify someone else. 165

One should not neglect one's own welfare for that of someone else, however great. When one has understood what one's own welfare really consists of, one should apply oneself to that welfare. 166

13. The World

Don't practice an ignoble way of life, don't indulge in a careless attitude. Don't follow a wrong view, and don't be attached to the world. 167

Wake up and don't be careless, but lead a life of well-doing. He who follows righteousness lives happily in this world and the next. 168

Lead a life of righteousness, and not a life of wrong-doing. He who follows righteousness lives happily in this world and the next. 169

Look on the world as a bubble, look on it as a mirage. The King of Death never finds him who views the world like that. 170

Come, look at the world as a gilded royal carriage, in which fools get bogged down, while men of understanding have no attachment to it. 171

Even if previously careless, when a man later stops being careless, he illuminates the world, like the moon breaking away from a cloud. 172

When a man's bad deeds are covered over by good ones, he illuminates the world, like the moon breaking away from a cloud. 173

Wild swans take the path of the sun. Men with powers travel through space, but the wise step right out of the world, by conquering Mara and his host. 175

When a man has already violated one rule, when he is a liar and rejects the idea of a future world, there is no evil he is not capable of. 176

Miserly people certainly do not go to heaven. Fools for sure do not praise generosity, but the wise man who takes pleasure in giving is thereby happy hereafter. 177

Better than being sole king of the whole earth, better than going to heaven or sovereignty over the whole universe is the fruit of becoming a stream-winner. 178

14. Buddhas

He whose victory is not relost, and whose victory no-one in the world can take away, that Buddha, whose home is in the infinite, pathless as he is, by what path will you lead him? 179

He who has no entrapping, clinging desire to lead him in any direction, that Buddha, whose home is in the infinite, pathless as he is, by what path will you lead him? 180

Those wise men, who are much given to meditation and find pleasure in the peace of a spiritual way of life, even the devas envy them perfect Buddhas and recollected as they are. 181

A human birth is hard to achieve. Difficult is the life of mortals. To hear the true teaching is difficult, and the achievement of Buddhahood is difficult. 182

To abstain from all evil, the practice of good, and the thorough purification of one's mind - this is the teaching of the Buddhas. 183

Long-suffering patience is the supreme ascetic practice. Nirvana is supreme, say the Buddhas. He is certainly not an ascetic who hurts others, and nor is he a man of religion who causes suffering to others. 184

Not to speak harshly and not to harm others, self restraint in accordance with the rules of the Order, moderation in food, a secluded dwelling, and the cultivation of the higher levels of consciousness - this is the teaching of the Buddhas. 185

There is no satisfying the senses, not even with a shower of money. "The senses are of slight pleasure and really suffering." When a wise man has realised this, he takes no pleasure, as a disciple of the Buddhas, even in the pleasures of heaven. Instead he takes pleasure in the elimination of craving. 186, 187

Driven by fear, men take to many a refuge, in mountains, forests, parks, sacred groves and shrines, but these are not a secure kind of refuge. By taking to this sort of refuge one is not released from suffering. He who has gone to Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha for refuge, though, and who with true wisdom understands the Four Noble Truths of Suffering, the Origin of Suffering, the End of Suffering and the Noble Eightfold Path, leading to the Elimination of Suffering, this is a secure refuge, this is the ultimate refuge; by taking to this refuge one is indeed released from all suffering. 188, 189, 190, 191, 192

A truly thoroughbred man (a Buddha) is hard to find. He is not born anywhere, but where that seer is born, the people prosper. 193

Happy is the attainment of Buddhahood, happy the teaching of the true Teaching, happy is the concord of the Sangha, happy the training of those in concord. 194

When a man venerates those worthy of veneration, be they Buddhas or their disciples, who have transcended all obstacles and passed beyond sorrow and tears - venerating such as these, whose passions are extinguished and for whom there is no further source for fear, no one can calculate how great his merit is. 195, 196

15. Happiness

Happy indeed we live who are free from hatred among those who still hate. In the midst of hate-filled men, we live free from hatred. 197

Happy indeed we live who are free from disease among those still diseased. In the midst of diseased men, we live free from disease. 198

Happy indeed we live who are free from worry among those who are still worried. In the midst of worried men, we live free from worry. 199

Happy indeed we live who have nothing of our own. We shall feed on joy, just like the radiant devas. 200

A victor only breeds hatred, while a defeated man lives in misery, but a man at peace within lives happily, abandoning up ideas of victory and defeat. 201

There is no fire like desire. There is no weakness like anger. There is no suffering like the khandhas. There is no happiness greater than peace. 202

Hunger is the supreme disease. Mental activity is the supreme suffering. When one has grasped this as it really is, nirvana is the supreme happiness. 203

Health is the supreme possession. Contentment is the supreme wealth. A trustworthy friend is the supreme relation. Nirvana is the supreme happiness. 204

After enjoying the taste of solitude and the taste of peace, one is freed from distress and evil, as one enjoys the taste of spiritual joy. 205

It is good to meet with the saints. Living with them is always sweet. By not meeting fools one can be happy all the time. 206

A man who keeps company with a fool, will suffer for it a long time. It is always painful to live with fools, like with an enemy, but a wise man is good to live with, like meeting up with relatives. 207

Therefore, if he is a man of understanding and penetration, learned and habitually moral, devout and noble, one should cultivate the company of that just and wise man, in the same way as the moon keeps to a path among the stars. 208

16. Preference

He who applies himself to what is not really an appropriate subject for application, and fails to apply himself to what is, missing the real purpose to grasp after what appeals to him, may well envy the man who does apply himself. 209

Never have anything to do with likes and dislikes. The absence of what one likes is painful, as is the presence of what one dislikes. 210

Therefore don't take a liking to anything. To lose what one likes is hard, but there are no bonds for those who have no likes and dislikes. 211

From preference arises sorrow, from preference arises fear, but he who is freed from preference has no sorrow and certainly no fear. 212

From affection arises sorrow, from affection arises fear, but he who is freed from affection has no sorrow and certainly no fear. 213

From pleasure arises sorrow, from pleasure arises fear, but he who is freed from pleasure has no sorrow and certainly no fear. 214

From sensuality arises sorrow, from sensuality arises fear, but he who is freed from sensuality has no sorrow and certainly no fear. 215

From craving arises sorrow, from craving arises fear, but he who is freed from craving has no sorrow and certainly no fear. 216

Well may people hold dear the man who is endowed with morality and insight, who is well established in righteousness, a seer of the truth, and applying himself to his own business. 217

He whose longing has been aroused for the indescribable, whose mind has been quickened by it, and whose thought is not attached to sensuality is truly called one who is bound upstream. 218

When a man who has been away a long time at last comes home safely from far away, his family, friends and acquaintances rejoice to see him back. In the same way, when a man who has done good goes from this world to the next, his good deeds receive him like relations welcoming a loved one back again. 219, 220

17. Anger

Abandon anger, give up pride, and overcome all fetters. Suffering does nor befall him who is without attachment to names and forms, and possesses nothing of his own. 221

When a man governs his rising anger like a chariot going out of control, that is what I call a charioteer. The rest are just holding the reins. 222

Overcome anger with freedom from anger. Overcome evil with good. Overcome meanness with generosity, and overcome a liar with truthfulness. 223

Speak the truth, don't get angry, and always give, even if only a little, when you are asked. By these three principles you can come into the company of the devas. 224

Those sages who do harm to no-one, and who are always physically restrained, go to the everlasting abode, reaching which they will face no more suffering. 225

Inflowing thoughts come to an end in those who are ever alert of mind, training themselves night and day, and ever intent on nirvana. 226

It was so of old, Atula. It is not just so today. They criticise him who sits in silence, they criticise him who talks a lot. They even criticise him who speaks in moderation. There is not a man in the world who is not criticised. 227

There never has been, there never will be, and there is not now any man exclusively criticised or exclusively praised. 228

If a wise man of unblemished behaviour and endowed with wisdom, morality and stillness of mind, is praised by the discriminating after day in day out acquaintance with him, like a pure gold coin, then who is fit to find fault with him? Even the King of the devas praises him. 229, 230

Guard against physical unruliness. Be restrained in body. Abandoning physical wrong doing, lead a life of physical well doing. 231

Guard against mental unruliness. Be restrained in mind. Abandoning mental wrong doing, lead a life of mental well doing. 232

Guard against verbal unruliness. Be restrained in speech. Abandoning verbal wrong doing, lead a life of verbal well doing. 233

The wise who are restrained in body, speech and mind - such are the well and truly restrained. 234

18. Faults

You are now like a withered leaf. Death's messengers themselves are in your presence. You are standing in the jaws of your departure, and provisions for the road you have none. 235

In such a case, build yourself an island. Make the effort quickly and become a wise man. Cleansed of your faults and now without blemish, you will go to the heavenly land of the saints. 236

You are now at your life's conclusion. You are in the presence of the King of Death. There is no stopping off place on the way, and provisions for the road you have none. 237

In such a case, build yourself an island. Make the effort quickly and become a wise man. Cleansed of your faults and now without blemish, you will come no more to birth and aging. 238

Little by little, moment by moment, a wise man should cleanse himself of blemishes, like a smith purifying silver. 239

Just as the rust which develops on iron, derives from it but then proceeds to eat it away, so a person of unrestrained behaviour is drawn to hell by his own actions. 240

Lack of repetition is the blight of scriptures. Lack of repairs is the blight of buildings. The blight of beauty is laziness, and carelessness is the blight of a guard. 241

The blight of a woman is misconduct. The blight of a giver is meanness. Bad mental states are indeed blights in this world and the next. 242

But the supreme bight, ignorance, is the blight of blights. Destroying this blight, be free of blights, bhikkhus. 243

Life is easy enough for the shameless, the crow-hero type of man, offensive, swaggering, impudent and depraved. But it is hard for the man of conscience, always striving after purity, alert, reserved, pure of behaviour and discerning. 244, 245

When a man takes life, tells lies, takes what he is not entitled to in the world, resorts to other men's wives and indulges in drinking wine and spirits - such a man is digging up his own roots here and now in this world. 246, 247

So understand this, my man - Unrestrained men are evil. Don't let greed and wrong doing subject you to lasting suffering. 248

People give according to their faith, or as they feel well disposed. If one is put out for that reason with other people's food and drink, then one will not achieve stillness of mind in meditation, day or night. But he who has destroyed that sort of reaction, has rooted it out and done away with it - he will achieve stillness of mind in meditation, day and night. 249, 250

There is no fire like desire. There is no hold like anger. There is no net like ignorance. There is no river like craving. 251

Other people's faults are easily seen. One can winnow out other people's faults like chaff. One hides one's own faults though, like a dishonest gambler hides an unlucky throw. 252

When one notices the mistakes of others and is always finding fault with them, the inflow of one's thoughts just increases and one is a long way from the cessation of this influx. 253

Just as there is no path in the sky, there is no man of religion outside. Other people take pleasure in multiplicity, but the Buddhas are free from it. 254

Just as there is no path in the sky, there is no man of religion outside. There are no lasting functions of the mind, but there is no oscillation of mind for the Buddhas. 255

19. The Righteous

One is not righteous if one decides a case without due consideration, but the wise man who takes into account both for and against, and comes to his decision about others with due consideration - such a man of discrimination who keeps to the truth, he is to be called righteous. 256, 257

One is not a learned man by virtue of much speaking. He who is patient, without anger and fearless, he is to be called learned. 258

One is not a bearer of the teaching by virtue of much speaking, but he who, even if he has only studied a little, has experienced the truth in person, he is indeed a bearer of the teaching, who has not forgotten the teaching. 259

One is not an elder by virtue of having white hair. One is just advanced in years, and called "grown old in vain". He in whom there is truthfulness, non violence, restraint and self control, however - that wise and faultless sage is to be called an elder. 260, 261

It is not just by fine speech or by flower-like beauty that one is admirable, if one is envious, mean and deceitful, but when that sort of behaviour has been eliminated, rooted out and destroyed, that faultless sage is said to be admirable. 262, 263

A shaven head does not make one a man of religion, if one is irreligious and untruthful. How could a man full of desires and greed be a man of religion? But when a man has put aside all evil deeds, both great and small, by that putting away of evil deeds he is indeed called a man of religion. 264, 265

One is not a bhikkhu by virtue of taking alms from others. By taking up any old teaching, one is not a bhikkhu on that account. But he who has here and now ejected both good and evil, and in leading the holy life lives in accordance with reason - he is indeed called a bhikkhu. 266, 267

Silence does not make a sage if he is stupid and ignorant, but when a man avoids evil as if he were choosing something of value on the scales - he is a sage. That indeed makes him a sage. He who discriminates in both worlds is for that reason called a sage. 268, 269

One is not noble if one harms other living creatures. It is by non violence to all forms of life that one is called noble. 270

It is not just by means of morality and religious observances, not by great learning nor by attainments in meditation, nor by living alone, nor by thinking,"I am enjoying a spiritual happiness which ordinary people do not know" that a bhikkhu achieves peace if he has not achieved the elimination of inflowing thoughts. 271, 272

20. The Way

Of paths the Eightfold one is best, and of truths the Fourfold. Dispassion is the best of mental states, and of human beings the best is the seer. 273

This indeed is the Way - there is no other - for the purification of one's vision. Follow this way. It leads to Mara's confusion. 274

Following this Path you will put an end to suffering. I have taught you the Way after realising the removal of the arrow myself. 275

Making the effort is your affair. The Buddhas have pointed out the Way. Those who are on the way and practising meditation will be freed from Mara's bonds. 276

All processes are impermanent. When one sees this with understanding, then one is disillusioned with the things of suffering. This is the Path of Purification. 277

All processes are painful. When one sees this with understanding, then one is disillusioned with the things of suffering. This is the Path of Purification. 278

All processes are out of my control. When one sees this with understanding, then one is disillusioned with the things of suffering. This is the Path of Purification. 279

Since he will not exert himself at the time for exertion, and although young and strong is full of indolence and irresolution and idleness, the lazy man is incapable of recognising the way of wisdom. 280

Be guarded in speech, restrained of mind and not doing anything wrong physically. Perfect these three forms of action, and fulfil the way taught by the sages. 281

From meditation springs wisdom. From lack of meditation, loss of wisdom. Recognising these alternative roads of progress and decline, one should so direct oneself so that one's wisdom will increase. 282

Cut down the forest, not just a tree. Out of the forest of desire springs danger. By cutting down both the forest of desire and the brushwood of longing, be rid of the forest (pun on the word "nirvana"), bhikkhus. 283

So long as the least desire of a man for women has not been eradicated, he is fettered in mind, like a sucking calf to its mother. 284

Pluck out your desire, like one does an autumn lotus with one's hand. Devote yourself to the path of peace, the nirvana proclaimed by the

Blessed One. 285

"Here I will spend the rainy season, and here the hot season." This is the way a fool thinks. It does not occur to him what may happen in between. 286

Death comes and snatches away the man infatuated with children and livestock, while his mind is still full of desire, like a great flood sweeping away a sleeping village. 287

There are no children to take refuge in then, no father or any other relative. When a man is seized by that terminator, Death, there is no taking refuge in family. 288

When he has seen the implications of this, a wise man, restrained by morality, should quickly develop the path leading to nirvana. 289

21. Miscellaneous

If he sees that by sacrificing a slight happiness he can obtain a greater happiness, then a wise man should sacrifice the lesser happiness with a view to the greater happiness. 290

He who seeks his own happiness by inflicting suffering on others, does not reach freedom from hatred, caught as he is in the toils of hatred. 291

What IS their affair is put aside. What is NOT their affair gets done. The inflow of thoughts in such brazen and careless people just goes on increasing. They whose recollection of the body is always well established, however, have nothing to do with what is not their affair, always persevering in what IS their affair. The inflow of thoughts in such recollected and aware people simply dies away. 292, 293

After killing mother (desire), father ("I am" conceit) and two warrior kings, and destroying the kingdom along with its subjects, the brahmin goes on his way unperturbed. 294

After killing mother, father and two priestly kings, and killed a tiger as his fifth victim, the brahmin goes on his way unperturbed. 295

A good awakening have ever Gotama's disciples, whose recollection is always established, day and night on the Buddha. 296

A good awakening have ever Gotama's disciples, whose recollection is always established, day and night on the Teaching. 297

A good awakening have ever Gotama's disciples, whose recollection is always established, day and night on the Order. 298

A good awakening have ever Gotama's disciples, whose recollection is always established, day and night on the body. 299

A good awakening have ever Gotama's disciples, whose minds are always rejoicing in non violence. 300

A good awakening have ever Gotama's disciples, whose minds are always rejoicing in the practice of meditation. 301

It is hard to take up a life of renunciation, and difficult to find satisfaction in it, but it is also difficult to live in bad households, and painful to live with people unlike oneself, when one is forever tangled in suffering and restless. Therefore don't always be restless, and don't let yourself be tangled in suffering. 302

When a man has faith, is endowed with virtue, and possessed of fame and wealth, wherever he lives he will be honoured. 303

The good are conspicuous a long way off, like a Himalayan peak, while the bad are just not noticed, like arrows shot into the dark. 304

Living alone, sleeping alone, travelling alone, and resolute, alone and self disciplined, should take pleasure in living in the forest. 305

22. Hell

He who speaks untruth goes to hell, as does he who, having done something, says, "I didn't do it." Men of ignoble behaviour, they both end up the same in the next world. 306

Many of those dressed in the yellow robe are evil and unrestrained, and the evil end up in hell because of their evil deeds. 307

It is better to swallow a red-hot, flaming iron ball than for an unrestrained and immoral person to eat the alms food of the land. 308

The thoughtless man who consorts with another man's wife encounters four things - accumulation of demerit, disturbed sleep, thirdly disgrace, and hell fourth. 309

Accumulation of demerit, a bad rebirth and the slight pleasure of a frightened man and a frightened woman - while the authorities impose a severe penalty too. Therefore a man should not consort with another man's wife. 310

In the same way that a wrongly handled blade of grass will cut one's hand, so a badly fulfilled life in religion will drag one down to hell. 311

Lax behaviour, broken observances and dubious chastity - these are on no great benefit. 312

If it ought to be done, then do it; apply yourself to it strenuously. A lax man of religion just spreads even more dust. 313

A bad action is best left undone. One is punished later for a bad action. But a good deed is best done, for which one will not be punished for doing it. 314

Guard yourself like a frontier town, guarded inside and out. Don't let a moment slip you by. Those who have missed their opportunity grieve for it when they end up in hell. 315

Ashamed of what is not a matter for shame, and not ashamed of what is,

by holding to wrong views people go to a bad rebirth. 316

Seeing danger where there is no danger, and not seeing danger where there is, by holding to wrong views people go to a bad rebirth. 317

Seeing a fault in what is not a fault, and not seeing a fault in what is, by holding to wrong views people go to a bad rebirth. 318

Recognising a fault as a fault, and what is not a fault as not one, by holding to right views people go to a good rebirth. 319

23. The Elephant

I will bear criticism like an elephant in battle bears an arrow from a bow. Most people are bad behaviour. 320

One can take a trained elephant even into a crowd. The king himself will ride a trained elephant. He who is disciplined is the best of men, since he can bear criticism. 321

Trained mules are excellent, and so are thoroughbred horses from the Sindh, and so are great battle elephants, but more excellent than them all is a disciplined man. 322

There is no reaching the unattainable with mounts like these, but with himself well under control a disciplined man can get there. 323

Dhammapalo, the elephant, is hard to control in rut. Even when tied up, he refuses his food. The great tusker is thinking of the elephant forest. 324

When a man is a lie-abed and over-eats, a lazy person who wallows in sleep like a great over-fed hog, a fool like that will be reborn time after time. 325

My mind used formerly to go off wandering wherever it felt like, following its own inclination, but today I shall control it carefully, like a mahout does a rutting elephant. 326

Take pleasure in being careful. Guard your mind well. Extricate yourself from the mire, like a great tusker sunk in the mud. 327

If you find an intelligent companion, a wise and well-behaved person going the same way as yourself, then go along with him, overcoming all dangers, pleased at heart and mindful. 328

But if you do not find an intelligent companion, a wise and well-behaved person going the same way as yourself, then go on your way alone, like a king abandoning a conquered kingdom, or like a great elephant in the deep forest. 329

It is better to travel alone. There is no companionship with a fool. Go on your way alone and commit no evil, without cares like a great elephant in the deep forest. 330

It is good to have companions when occasion arises, and it is good to be contented with whatever comes. Merit is good at the close of life, and the elimination of all suffering is good. 331

Good is filial devotion to one's mother in the world, and devotion to one's father is good. It is good to be a sanyasi in the world and to be a brahmin too. 332

Good is good behaviour up to old age, good is firmly established faith, good is the acquisition of understanding, and abstention from evil is good. 333

24. Craving

The desire of a thoughtlessly living man grows like a creeper. He drifts from one life to another like a monkey looking for fruit in the forest. 334

When one is overcome by this wretched, clinging desire in the world, one's sorrows increase like grass growing up after a lot of rain. 335

But when one masters this wretched desire, which is so hard to overcome, then one's sorrows just drop off, like a drop of water off a lotus. 336

This is what I say to you - Good luck be with you, gathered here. Dig up the root of craving, as one does a weed for its fragrant root. Don't let Mara destroy you again and again, like a stream does its reeds. 337

In the same way that even a felled tree will grow again if its root is strong and undamaged, so if latent desire has not been rooted out, then suffering shoots up again and again. 338

When the thirty six pleasure-bound streams of craving are strong in a man, then numerous desire-based thoughts pull the deluded man along. 339

The streams (of craving) flow everywhere, and the creeper hoots up and establishes itself, so when you see the creeper shooting up, cut away its root with your understanding. 340

The recollection and attraction of pleasures occur to a man, and those who are attached to the agreeable and seeking enjoyment, they are the people subject to birth and aging. 341

People beset by desire run here and there, like a snared rabbit, and those trapped in the bonds of attachments keep returning for a long time to suffering. 342

People beset by desire run here and there, like a snared rabbit, so one should get rid of one's craving if it is freedom from desire that one wants. 343

When a man out of the forest of desire is drawn back into the forest, then free from the forest as he is, he runs back into it. Look at him - free, he is running back to chains. 344

The wise say that it is not an iron, wooden or fibre fetter which is a strong one, but the besotted hankering after trinkets, children and wives, that, say the wise, is the strong fetter. It drags one down, and loose as it feels, it is hard to break. Breaking this fetter, people renounce the world, free from longing and abandoning sensuality. 345, 346

Those on fire with desire follow the stream of their desires, like a spider follows the strands of its self-made web. Breaking the bond, the wise walk on free from longing, and leaving all suffering behind. 347

Let go the past, let go the future, and let go what is in between, transcending the things of time. With your mind free in every direction, you will not return to birth and aging. 348

When a man is stimulated by his own thoughts, full of desire and dwelling on what is attractive, his craving increases even more. He is making the fetter even stronger. But he who takes pleasure in stilling his thoughts, practising the contemplation of what is repulsive, and remaining recollected, now he will make an end of craving, he will snap the bonds of Mara. His aim is accomplished, he is without fear, rid of craving and without stain. He has removed the arrows of changing existence. This is his last body. 349, 350, 351

Rid of craving and without clinging, an expert in the study of texts, and understanding the right sequence of the words, he may indeed be called "In his last body", "Great in wisdom" and a "Great man". 352

All-conquering and all-knowing am I. Amidst all states of mind, unaffected am I. By abandoning everything, I am liberated by the cessation of desire. Having achieved Realisation by myself, who should I point to as my teacher? 353

The gift of the Truth beats all other gifts. The flavour of the Truth beats all other tastes. The joy of the Truth beats all other joys, and the cessation of desire conquers all suffering. 354

Riches destroy a fool, but not those who are seeking the other shore. The fool destroys himself by his craving for riches, as he destroys others too. 355

Consequently offerings to those free from desire are of great fruit. 356

Weeds are the blight of fields. Anger is the blight of mankind. Consequently offerings to those free from anger are of great fruit. 357

Weeds are the blight of fields. Delusion is the blight of mankind. Consequently offerings to those free from delusion are of great fruit. 358

Weeds are the blight of fields. Self-seeking is the blight of mankind. Consequently offerings to those free from self-seeking are of great fruit. 359

25. The bhikkhu

Restraint of the eyes is good. So is restraint of the ears. Restraint of the nose is good, and so is restraint of the palate. 360

Restraint of the body is good. So is restraint of speech. Restraint of mind is good, and so is restraint in everything. The bhikkhu who is restrained in everything, is freed from all suffering. 361

Restrained of hand, restrained of foot, restrained of speech and restrained in his highest faculty, with his joy turned inwards, his mind still, alone and contented - that is what they call a bhikkhu. 362

When a bhikkhu is restrained of tongue, quotes wise sayings, and is peaceful, expounding both letter and spirit - his speech is good to hear. 363

With joy in the Teaching, delighting in the Teaching, and pondering over the Teaching, the bhikkhu who remembers the Teaching does not fall away from the Teaching. 364

One should not underestimate what one has got, and one should not live envying others. A bhikkhu who envies others does not achieve stillness of mind in meditation. 365

Even if he has only received a little, if a bhikkhu does not look down on what he has received, even the devas praise him, pure of life and determined as he is. 366

When a man is without self-identification with any object or idea, and does not grieve for what does not exist - that is what is called a bhikkhu. 367

The bhikkhu who lives full of goodwill, with faith in the religion of the Buddha - he will reach the place of peace, the satisfaction of stilling the functions of the mind. 368

Empty the boat, bhikkhu. Empty it will sail lightly for you. When you have cut away desire and aversion, you will come to nirvana as a result. 369

Cut away the five (lower fetters), abandon the five (remaining fetters), and then develop the five (faculties). The bhikkhu who has transcended the five fetters is said to be "crossed over the flood". 370

Meditate, bhikkhu, don't be careless, don't let your mind take pleasure in the senses. Don't have to swallow the iron ball for being careless. Don't have to cry out, "This is terrible" as you burn. 371

There is no meditation without wisdom, and there is no wisdom without meditation. When a man has both meditation and wisdom, he is indeed close to nirvana. 372

When he has gone off to a lonely building, the bhikkhu whose mind is at peace experiences a more than human joy, when he recognises the supreme Truth. 373

Whenever he meditates on the rise and fall of the constituent elements of existence, he experiences joy and rapture. It is immortality for men of discrimination. 374

Therefore in this religion, this is what comes first for a wise bhikkhu - guarding of the senses, contentment, and discipline in accordance with the rules of the Order. He should cultivate friends of good character, of pure behaviour and resolute. He should be friendly in his manner, and well-behaved. As a result he will experience great joy, and put an end to suffering. 375, 376

In the same way that the jasmine drops its withered flowers, you too should discard desire and aversion, bhikkhus. 377

Peaceful of body, peaceful of speech and with his mind thoroughly stilled, the bhikkhu who has rid himself of attachment to the world - is called "at peace". 378

You should encourage yourself, yourself. You should restrain yourself, yourself. When you are self-protected like that, you will live happily as a bhikkhu. 379

One is one's own guard. What other guard could one have? One is one's own destiny. Therefore one should train oneself, like a merchant does a thoroughbred horse. 380

The bhikkhu who experiences great joy, and has faith in the religion of the Buddha, will attain the place of peace, the satisfaction of stilling the functions of the mind. 381

When a bhikkhu applies himself when still young to the religion of the Buddha, he illuminates the world, like the moon breaking breaking away from a cloud. 382

26. The brahmin

Cut the stream and go across, abandon sensuality, brahmin. When you have achieved the stilling of the activities of the mind, you will know the unconditioned, brahmin. 383

When a brahmin has crossed beyond duality, then all the fetters of such a seer come to an end. 384

When a man knows no this shore, other shore, or both - such a one, free from anxiety, liberated, that is what I call a brahmin. 385

Meditating, free from stain, settled in mind, with job accomplished, without inflowing thoughts, and having achieved the supreme purpose - that is what I call a brahmin. 386

By day it is the sun which shines, at night the moon shines forth. A warrior shines in his armour, and a brahmin shines in meditation. But at all times, by day and by night, the Buddha shines in his glory. 387

A brahmin is called so by breaking with evil deeds. It is by pious behaviour that a man is called a man of religion, and by casting out blemishes one is called one gone forth. 388

One should not strike a brahmin, and nor should a brahmin lose his temper. Shame on him who strikes a brahmin, and shame on him who loses his temper because of it. 389

Nothing is better in a brahmin than this - that he restrains his mind from pleasurable things. Suffering disappears for him to the same extent that he gets rid of thoughts of harming anyone. 390

He who does no wrong with body, speech or mind, but is restrained in all three spheres - that is what I call a brahmin. 391

One should reverently pay homage to the man from whom one has learned the Truth, taught by the True Buddha, like a brahmin does to the sacrificial fire. 392

One is not a brahmin by virtue of matted hair, lineage or caste. When a man possesses both Truth and truthfulness, then he is pure, then he is a brahmin. 393

What use is your matted hair, you fool? What use is your antelope skin? You are tangled inside, and you are just making the outside pretty. 394

forest - that is what I call a brahmin. 395

I do not call him a brahmin who is so by natural birth from his mother.
He is just a supercilious person if he still has possessions of his own.
He who owns nothing of his own, and is without attachment - that is what I call a brahmin. 396

He who, having cut off all fetters, does not get himself upset, but is beyond bonds - that liberated man is what I call a brahmin. 397

He who has cut off both bond and strap, halter as well as bridle, who has removed the barrier, himself a Buddha - that is what I call a brahmin. 398

He who endures undisturbed criticism, ill-treatment and bonds, strong in patience, and that strength his power - that is what I call a brahmin.
399

Without anger, devout, upright, free from craving, disciplined and in his last body - that is what I call a brahmin. 400

Like water on a lotus leaf, like a mustard seed on the point of an pin, he who is not stuck to the senses - that is what I call a brahmin. 401

He who has experienced the end of his suffering here in this life, who has set down the burden, freed! - that is what I call a brahmin. 402

The sage of profound wisdom, the expert in the right and wrong road, he who has achieved the supreme purpose - that is what I call a brahmin.
403

Not intimate with laity or monks, wandering about with no abode, and few needs - that is what I call a brahmin. 404

Abandoning violence to all living creatures moving or still, he who neither kills or causes killing - that is what I call a brahmin. 405

Unagitated amongst the agitated, at peace among the violent, without clinging among those who cling - that is what I call a brahmin. 406

He from whom desire and aversion, conceit and hypocrisy have fallen away, like a mustard seed on the point of a pin - that is what I call a brahmin. 407

He who utters only gentle, instructive and truthful speech, criticising no-one - that is what I call a brahmin. 408

He who takes nothing in the world that has not been given him, long or short, big or small, attractive or that is what I call a brahmin. 409

He who has no desires in this world or the next, without longings, freed! - that is what I call a brahmin. 410

He who has no attachments and has been freed from uncertainty by realisation, who has plunged into the deathless - that is what I call a brahmin. 411

He who has even here and now transcended the fetter of both good and evil, who is sorrowless, faultless and pure - that is what I call a brahmin. 412

The man who is stainless, pure, clear and free from impurities like the moon, the search for pleasure extinguished - that is what I call a brahmin. 413

He who has transcended the treacherous mire of samsara and ignorance, who has crossed over, reached the other shore, meditating, motionless of mind, free from uncertainty, and who is at peace by not clinging to anything - that is what I call a brahmin. 414

He who by here and now abandoning sensuality, has gone forth a homeless wanderer, the search for pleasure extinguished - that is what I call a brahmin. 415

He who by here and now abandoning craving, has gone forth a homeless wanderer, the search for pleasure extinguished - that is what I call a

brahmin. 416

He who has abandoned human bonds, and transcended those of heaven, liberated from all bonds - that is what I call a brahmin. 417

He who has abandoned pleasure and displeasure, is cooled off and without further fuel, the hero who has conquered all worlds - that is what I call a brahmin. 418

He who has seen the passing away and rebirth of all beings, free of clinging, blessed, awakened - that is what I call a brahmin. 419

He whose path devas, spirits and men cannot know, whose inflowing thoughts are ended, a saint - that is what I call a brahmin. 420

He who has nothing of his own, before, after or in between, possessionless and without attachment - that is what I call a brahmin. 421

Bull-like, noble, a hero, a great sage, and a conqueror, he who is motionless of mind, washed clean and awakened - that is what I call a brahmin. 422

He who has known his former lives and can see heaven and hell themselves, while he has attained the extinction of rebirth, a seer, master of transcendent knowledge, and master of all masteries - that is what I call a brahmin. 423

The Renewal of Vows Ceremony

a talk by John Daido Loori, Sensei

Zen Mountain Monastery

New Year's Eve, December 31, 1992

[This is a transcription of a Dharma talk given by the abbot of Zen Mountain Monastery, Mt. Tremper, New York, at the conclusion of Rohatsu Sesshin.]

Usually, this part of the Fusatsu ceremony is used to address some part of the teachings of the Precepts, the moral and ethical teachings of the Buddha. Every once in a while I speak of the ceremony itself, the Renewal of Vows Ceremony. Tonight seems to be a good time to talk about the ceremony itself, since many of you are doing it for the first time. It's nice to know a little bit about what's going on.

We begin this ceremony like we begin most of our [Fusatsu] ceremonies, and that is with the Gatha of Atonement, or at-one-ment, and we chant, "all evil karma ever committed by me since of old." The Precepts are designed to function in the world of this and that, in the world of good and evil. They're based on the realization of the Buddha. They are fundamentally the definition of the way a Buddha, a realized being, lives a life in the world of differences.

Karma is basically, in its simplest way of describing it, cause and effect. For every cause, there's an effect. And that effect becomes the next cause, and it creates an effect, and that effect becomes the next cause, and on and on. And the one characteristic of karma is the force to propagate itself, to continue. Karma means "action." And so here we're addressing the evil karma that we've committed in times past.

And next we chant, "on account of my beginningless greed, anger, and ignorance." Greed, anger, and ignorance are what we call in Buddhism the Three Poisons. They're based on separation. They're based on the illusion that things are separate from ourselves. When you turn them around, when you turn it to the other side, these Three Poisons become the Three Virtues. The virtue of compassion, the virtue of wisdom, and the virtue of enlightenment. Ignorance means having no light; having no light, not knowing what's real. Not knowing what's real is not having realized for oneself the unity of all things, the interdependence and mutual causality of the entire phenomenal universe. That's the basis of the Buddha's realization, and that's the basis of the Precepts.

The next line we chant, "born of my body, mouth, and thought." And these are the ways that we create evil karma. We create evil karma by what we do with our bodies; by what we do with our words, our mouth; and by what we do with our thoughts, what we think. And thought is the one that's usually the most difficult to comprehend. We can understand how we create evil karma by what we do with our body. If you hit someone, you've definitely created karma; there are going to be consequences, effects. If you say to someone, "I would like to hit you," that also clearly would create consequences and effects. But we should realize that we equally create evil karma when we think, I'd like to punch you in the nose, even if we have a smile on our face. It communicates. There's no question about it. So how we use our mind creates karma. And we'll talk a little more about it as we get deeper into this.

So "all evil karma ever committed by me since of old, on account of my beginningless greed, anger, and ignorance, born of my body, mouth, and thought, I now atone for it all." I'm now at one with it all. Basically what that means is recognizing the fact that what you do and what happens to you are the same thing, that cause and effect are one, not two. And when you realize_not understand, not believe, but realize_that what you do and what happens to you are the same thing, there's no way to avoid taking responsibility for your life. There's no longer any way you can conceivably say, "He made me angry," because you know that only you can make you angry. And when that fact really comes home, you empower yourself to do something about anger. So long as he made you angry, you will continue to be a victim.

But when you make that responsibility your own you empower yourself to do something about it. Not only about anger, but anything. That responsibility, that sense of responsibility, encompasses the whole universe, because it's based on the realization that we're not separate from the universe. What happens to the ten thousand things happens to me. What's going on in Somalia is going on right here. In the jungles of South America. In the Ozone layer. Whatever affects this great universe affects this body and this mind. That's the realization of the Buddha, and that's the realization that these Precepts are based on.

When you atone, become at one with it all, when you take responsibility for it, you return to that oneness. Nothing outside of it. The Gatha of at-one-ment creates the space for the ceremony to happen. And then we chant the names of the Buddhas. We chant:

"Namu past seven Buddhas.

Namu Shakyamuni Buddha

Namu Manjushri Bodhisattva

Namu Samantabhadra Bodhisattva

and so on.

Namu means being one with, being one with the past seven Buddhas. Being one with Shakyamuni Buddha. But how do you be one with something? You students who are working with the breath, or with Mu, several of you have asked about that, this Sesshin. What does it means to be one with something? It's about intimacy, being one with something. It's not an idea. It's about no separation, being one with something. It means whole body and mind unity. Every thought, every breath, every cell in your body, unified. Being one with something is very similar to invoking something. To invoke means to call forth by incantation, to conjure. To put into effect or operation. To bring about. To cause is to invoke.

Bodhidharma, in his teaching, spoke about invocation and what it's about. He says,

"Buddha means awareness, the awareness of the body and of the mind, that prevents evil from arising in either. To invoke means to call to mind, to call constantly to mind the rules of discipline, the Precepts, and to follow them with all your might. This is what's meant by invoking. Invoking has to do with thought, and not with language. To invoke you have to understand the dharma of invoking. If it's not present in your mind, your mouth chants an empty name. As long as you're troubled by the Three Poisons, greed, anger, and ignorance, or by thoughts of yourself, your deluded mind will keep you from seeing the Buddha, and you'll only waste your effort.

"Chanting and invoking are worlds apart. Chanting is done with the mouth. Invoking is done with the mind. And because invoking comes from the mind it's the door to awareness. Chanting is centered in the mouth and appears as sound. If you cling to appearances while searching for meaning, you won't find a thing. Thus the sages of the past cultivated introspection and not speech.

"This mind is the source of all virtues And this mind is the chief of all powers. The eternal bliss of Nirvana comes from the mind at rest. Birth in the Three Realms also comes from the mind. The mind is the door to every world, and the mind is the ford to the other shore. Those who know where the door is don't worry about reaching it. Those who knows where the ford is don't worry about crossing it."

Keep in mind this was written around the year 500.

"The people I meet nowadays are superficial. They think of merit as something that has form. They squander their wealth and butcher creatures of land and sea. They foolishly concern themselves with erecting statues and stupas, telling people to pile up lumber and bricks, and to paint this blue and that green. They strain body and mind, injure themselves, and mislead others. They don't know enough to be ashamed. How will they ever come to realize it? They see something tangible and instantly become attached. If you talk to them about formlessness, they sit there dumb and confused. Greedy for the small mercies of this world, they remain blind to the great suffering.

"Such disciples wear themselves out in vain. Turning from the true to the false, they talk about nothing but future blessings. If you can simply concentrate your minds' inner light and behold its outer illumination, you'll dispel the Three Poisons, drive away the Six Thieves. Once and for all and without effort, you'll gain possession to an infinite number of virtues, perfections, and doors to truth. Seeing through the mundane and witnessing the sublime is less than an eyeblink away. Realization is now; why worry about gray hair? But the true door is hidden, and can't be revealed. I have only touched upon the beholding mind."

That beholding mind is the mind that unifies us with these Buddhas that we chant. That beholding mind is the mind that can invoke the presence of all Buddhas and ancestors.

"Namu Past Seven Buddhas." The past seven Buddhas are the six Buddhas that preceded Shakyamuni and Shakyamuni.

"Namu Shakyamuni Buddha," the historical Buddha, who after his own realization , stayed in the world and taught for forty-seven years. It's because of that teaching that it was transmitted mind to mind, from generation to generation. and has come down to us to this time, this place, this mountain. We're unified with the historical Buddha.

"Namu Manjushri Bodhisattva. Namu Samantabhadra Bodhisattva." Of these two Bodhisattvas, Manjushri is the Bodhisattva of Wisdom. Samantabhadra is the Bodhisattva of Compassion. In the Buddha Hall, one sits on one side of the Buddha and the other sits on the other side of the Buddha. Manjushri rides a lion; Samantabhadra, an elephant. They represent the two aspects of Buddha, Wisdom and Compassion.

"Namu Manjushri Bodhisattva" means being one with the wisdom of Manjushri. "Namu Samantabhadra Bodhisattva" means being one with the compassion of Samanabhadra. "Namu Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva." Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva is the Hearer of the Cries of the World. And one of the characteristics of Avalokiteshvara is that she manifests herself in accord with the circumstances. So she always presents herself in a form that's appropriate to what's going on. In the bowery, she manifests as a bum. Tonight, in barrooms across the country, she'll manifest as a drunk. Or as a motorist on the highway, or as a fireman, or a physician. Always responding in accord with the circumstances, in a form appropriate to the circumstances. How is that?

Every time there's a stranded vehicle on the side of the road and a motorist stops to help Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva has manifested herself. Those characteristics of wisdom and compassion are the characteristics of all beings. All Buddhas. We all have that potential. It's just a matter of awakening it. You awaken it by realizing there's no separation between self and other.

"Namu Maitreya Buddha," the Buddha of the future, to be born in future generations. And "Namu Successive Daioshos." Daiosho means "great priest." The Successive Daioshos are the succession of ancestors who transmitted the Dharma from Shakyamuni Buddha to Mahakashyapa, from Mahakashyapa to Ananda, and so on through 28 generations in India, through 28* generations in China, in Japan, and now to this country. Mind to mind. It's not the scriptures that were transmitted, it's not institutions that were transmitted, it's not ideas that were transmitted, it's not beliefs that were transmitted. It was the Buddha Mind that was transmitted. It's the Buddha Mind that these teachings are a manifestation of.

And then we chant, when we return to the ceremony, the Four Vows:

Sentient beings are numberless; I vow to save them.

Desires are inexhaustible; I vow to put an end to them.

The Buddha way is unattainable; I vow to attain it.

It's an incredibly powerful way to close out the old year and enter the new. Vowing to save all sentient beings. But they're numberless! That means there's no end to the number of them. And yet you vow to save them. Impossible! It can't be done. But you vow to save them. And by the way, if you intend to save all sentient beings, you'd better be prepared to be saved by all sentient beings. It goes both ways. Cause and effect goes both ways. Effect doesn't follow cause, nor does cause precede effect. They're one, and they move forward in time and they move backward in time.

"Desires are inexhaustible; I vow to put an end to them." By definition they're inexhaustible. How can you possibly put an end to them? "I vow to put an end to them. The dharmas are boundless; I vow to master them." Boundless means having no edges. To master them means to put a frame around them. It can't be done. "I vow to master them." "The Buddha Way is unattainable; I vow to attain it." It can't be done. "I vow to attain it."

To me, the impossibility of these vows is the essence of this practice. We call it "filling the well with snow," carrying shovels full of snow down from the mountain peak and throwing it in the well. The sages do it all the time, and they get other sages to help them do it. Of course, you can't fill a well that way. But that doesn't seem to bother them. They're not concerned with the goal; it's the process that they're involved in. Practice and enlightenment are one. It's not the goal of getting all sentient beings saved, it's the practice of saving all sentient beings. Of putting an end to desires, of mastering the dharmas. Of attaining the Way.

And then we chant the Three Treasures:

Being one with the Buddha; with all sentient beings,

Raise the Bodhi mind! Let the supreme way be realized.

"Raise the bodhi mind" is the aspiration for enlightenment. Being one with the dharma, with all sentient beings, penetrate all sutras, let wisdom be like the ocean. Being one with the sangha, with all sentient beings, lead the people, let harmony pervade everywhere. Buddha, dharma, sangha. Buddha, the historical Buddha, and at once all sentient beings. Buddha means enlightened one. Dharma, the teachings of the Buddha, but at once, the whole phenomenal universe. Sangha, the community of practitioners of the Buddha's dharma, and at once the whole phenomenal universe, all sentient beings. So Buddha, dharma, and sangha is at once the individual and the whole universe.

And then finally we bring the whole thing to a conclusion by giving it away. the whole ceremony of the precepts. The Eno chants, "May the merits of maintaining the Precepts permeate the dharma world, and may our sincere vows to accomplish the Buddha Way be realized together." May the merits pervade the dharma world, the whole universe, the whole universe of things; may the merit of this ceremony reach everywhere. It means to give it away. And it's in that giving, giving away of ourselves, giving our life, giving our practice, that we unify with the ten thousand things. When we give thanks, when we express gratitude in our services, we give back to the Buddhas and ancestors that which we receive. If we didn't give back like that, it would makes us thieves, we would just be taking. That's the same dynamic in the teacher-student relationship. The teacher gives, the student receives; the student gives, the teacher receives. It works both ways. Otherwise you feel inadequate, you don't feel right about it, you don't really make it your own.

At the beginning of the month we did a Rohatsu Sesshin at Greenhaven Prison_we have a Sangha there_and did a Precepts Ceremony during that time. And usually when I do the precepts ceremonies I have a little envelope that I keep the materials for the ceremony in. And when I finished I just took that and put it in one of the side rooms, and we went on with the other things that needed to be done. I didn't look at it until this evening, as I was preparing to come here to give a Fusatsu talk. And when I opened it a little note fell out. I saw it for the first time 45 minutes ago.

It's handwritten. And it says,

"You answer so many questions that I have glanced at from time to time. They seem not at all that important so I shove them to the side. They are not important until answered. Then they become overpowering. And mostly they're just everyday question that any new student might come across.

"Smoking is not a good thing for your body, medically speaking. But when I saw a man smoking it was sort of a statement saying, 'Hey, look, my friend, I'm human just like you. I have traveled far and I have far to travel.' I see the young lady hoping and wondering, hovering in the background at mealtime, making sure everything is all right; and when it's not, running to make things right. I hear a woman talking in such a way as to explain without explaining things as if to an idiot, making you feel safe in exploration of different chanting methods. I saw a lady introducing herself and asking the inmates their names, not caring there's a number attached, making an inmate feel like a person. Now that's something special A man sits on the sidelines yet in the middle, quietly but confidently showing a way by example to people not quite as knowledgeable, but trying and willing to learn, if they could have a teacher such as this. You cannot buy happiness, but when it's given from the heart, take it and cherish it. And then give it to someone who needs it more. This always will be someone other than yourself. For indescribable gifts given so freely by a few, thank you."

It's signed, A Person

There isn't any Buddha that could make it more complete. Dana. Giving, receiving. And that's what this new year should be for us. To give ourselves to the teaching, to the dharmas, to the ten thousands things. To whoever needs us, whenever they need us. There can be no finer vow, it's the vow of all Buddhas and ancestors. And it's because of that vow that we're fortunate enough to have this incredible Buddha Dharma here, in this country, to practice, to stay.
